WE are amused to see how earnestly polemical writers now urge against Millerism the very reasonings which they scorned a short time since as absurd because used by Universalists! They find they must use our method of interpreting the prophecies; and in their desperation to save their flocks from 'ravenous wolves,' they grasp at the only weapons which can enable them to do the work effectually. But in many places they ill succeed, because of two reasons;—They have delayed too long till their hearers have become fully given over to the Miller mania; and when they commenced the battle, the deluded ones on turning back at the sound of the Shepherds' cry, saw weapons in their hands which they had been taught to hate, and their own pastors looked more terrible, armed as they had always pictured a Universalist, than the wolves against which they were warned. Many a pastor who has learned his people to hate 'the Universalists' mode of interpreting prophecies, is now reaping his reward in the desolations over which he is called to mourn.

We give one specimen, from a late publication, of the adoption of our method of interpreting several prophetic passages:—'Christ's second coming was at, or about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, A. D., 70. This we can easily prove, for Christ said positively, "verily I say unto you, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the son of man coming in his kingdom:" (see Mat. xvi. 28,) the same declaration is recorded by Mark, ix. 1, and by Luke, ix. 27; thus there can be no mistake in this testimony, but we will proceed with more:—in Matthew, chap. xxiv, he describes the signs that were to precede his coming, and he told them, when they saw these things, that they might know that his coming was near—even at their doors. And again, "Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." Now, think ye that this Scripture was given for our instruction, or was the Savior jesting? Did he or his Apostles ever teach men that they should, by any means, know the exact year when those things should be fulfilled? No! but Mr. Miller has—he seems to know those things to a nicety! We will hear the Savior on this point—he says, "But of that day, and hour knoweth no man, no, not even the angels of heaven, but my Father only." We read again, in Luke, xxi. 20, 22, "And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh; for these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled."

'Again, he says—speaking of the end of the age and destruction of Jerusalem, "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel, the prophet, stand in the holy place, 'whoso readeth let him understand.'" Ah! was this Scripture intended to be understood? was this intended for instruction? surely it was! then let us review it a little.

'We find positively that Jerusalem was to be the seat of the awful desolation, and manifest vengeance of Omnipotence;—there it was where the prophecies of Daniel centred, and there is where all things that were written should be fulfilled; now mind, this is not Mr. Miller speaking. Christ said, "O! Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the Prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! behold! your house is left unto you desolate, that upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zacharias: verily I say unto you, all these things shall come upon this generation." What can be plainer than this? [See Mat. xxiii.] But the time when those things should be, we will notice further. Christ said, Mark, i. 14, "Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, saying, the time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand, repent ye therefore, and believe the gospel." Now here is the time, times, and all of Mr. Miller's times counted up by Christ and pronounced fulfilled. The 2300 days of Daniel, 70 weeks, &c., which Mr. Miller has stretched out into years, cut and spliced, &c., at his will, seems to have all been fulfilled long since. And further: The time at which the prophecies of Daniel were fulfilled can be made plain to every one:—we read in Daniel's last chapter, "And at that time (meaning the time of the abomination that maketh desolation) shall Michael stand up, the great prince, which standeth for the children of thy people, and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation; even to that same time, and at that time, thy people shall be delivered; every one that shall be found written in the book." We compare this with Christ's prediction, speaking of Jerusalem, he says, "For there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people;" (mind he said this people, speaking in the then present tense,) "And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all the nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled; and there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars, and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea, and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken; and then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud, with power and great glory; and when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh." Luke xxi, 24, 25, 26, 27.

'Now here is harmony and accordance between Daniel and Christ: Daniel says, "at that time thy people shall be delivered;" Christ says, "when these begin to come to pass, then look up for your redemption draweth nigh." The distress spoken of also tallies; and Christ even adds more, in Mat. xxiv, 21, he says, "For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be:" then if Daniel's prophecies were not fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem, they could not be afterwards for Christ limited them. But let us see. "But thou, O Daniel! shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end." (The same end which Christ often spoke of—the end of the Jewish age, or Mosaic dispensation.) Again: "Then I, Daniel, looked, and behold there stood other two (Angels), the one on this side of the bank of the river, and the other on that side, and one said to the man clothed in linen, how long shall it be to the end of these wonders? And I heard the man clothed in linen, when he held up his right hand, and his left hand unto heaven, and swore—by him that liveth for ever—that it shall be for a time, times and a half?" Now how are we to find out how to measure this time, times, and a half? We have it measured to our hand in the same verse! "and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished,"—not merely fulfilled, but finished. Now who were the "holy people?" every body knows that the Jews were called the holy people, yea! God's peculiar people, and every body knows too, that the Jews were scattered at, and immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem; thus it is evident that Daniel's prophecies were then fulfilled—"finished;" and thus you see how we can get along when we start right—by making Scripture explain Scripture, and making Scripture measure its own time, too, without putting us to the trouble (say nothing about the sin) of stretching, bobbing and piecing, as Mr. Miller does.

'But Daniel did not seem to understand what was told him, as well perhaps as we do, for we have the advantage of him, by knowing how and where those things were fulfilled. Daniel did not have Christ to teach, and explain them to him; or history to teach him of the actual fulfilment of them, for the fulfilment was then in the future; and Daniel, when he asked for an explanation, was told to go away, and wait till the fulfilment should be, then he would know all about it, and then he should "stand in his lot," and partake of his "rest" with the sanctified of God. [See last chapter and verses of Daniel.] We presume Dr. Adam Clarke's testimony will have some weight here: he says, speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem, "They were days in which all the calamities predicted by Moses, Daniel and the Savior, met in one common centre, and were fulfilled in the most terrible manner on that generation." But we will hear Dr. Clarke farther, as Mr. Miller contends that the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel, was not to be seen until about the year 1839, three years ago only; but Christ contradicts him, history contradicts him, and common sense contradicts him—but un-common sense sticks to him. Dr. Clarke also contradicts him; he says, "This abomination of desolation refers to the Roman army; and this abomination, standing in the holy place, is the Roman army besieging Jerusalem; this, our Lord says, is what was spoken of by Daniel the prophet." Dr. Clarke then adds, "so let every one who reads these prophecies understand them!" for they are given by inspiration of God, and are profitable for doctrine, reproof and correction, furnishing the man of God with something better than Millerism.'

THE tongue of scandal setteth on fire the moral firmament of a neighborhood. PR.

'TELL ME YOU LOVE ME.'

WORDS are too feeble to portray
The love I fain would show;
Or I would tell thee every day
I feel a pure and fervid glow
Come o'er me with the early light,
Grow with the growing day,
Shine with the sun, and through the night
In visions round me play.

'Tis love for thee! oh what beside
Could on my heart thus set its seal?
What o'er the earth or waters wide
Could cause the rapt'rous joy I feel
When, or where'er thy name is heard
In tone of praise, or joyous pride?
What rouse me as a single word
With scornful air to thee applied?

'Tis love for thee! such love as those
Who worship self can never know;
Love that defies decay, and throws
Its bright'ning influence round me now,
As throws the mem'ry of good deeds
Its lustre o'er our after years,
Illuming much, tho' no one heeds,
Our passage through 'this vale of tears.'

'Tis love for thee! nor can tongue tell
How free from all the base alloy,
That causes oft the heart to swell
With feelings not akin to joy;
Nor how I once liked not thy face
And only prized thy mind,
Tho' now I know their every grace,
I love them both combined.

I love thee when the tall church fane
First glitters in the sun's soft rays,
And fluttering birds make hill and plain
Re-echo with their notes of praise;—
And when the last faint ling'ring light
Of day is fading in the West,
And the same songsters for the night
Are hast'ning to their place of rest.

I love thee when the wintry storm
Of snows is driving madly past,
And many a shrinking, shiv'ring form
Is sadly list'ning to its blast;
And love thee when the summer rain
Pours quickly down in passing shower,
Refreshes earth, and bids again
Revive each drooping bud and flower.

I'll love thee ever! naught shall turn
The bright warm feelings of my heart
From thee; nor can I ever learn
To act with thee the masker's part;
In death I'll love thee! if I may
Draw near thee then with none to chide,
I'll kiss thy clay-cold lips and pray
To soon be sleeping by thy side.

THE GREAT ENCOURAGEMENT TO GOODNESS.

BY HENRY BACON.

22. VI. 15-16

It was early morning when the servant of the prophet Elisha went forth from the humble home—it may be to his duty, or to breathe the fresh and bracing air, or to look round about the habitation of his master to see what the darkness of the night might have enabled the enemy to do—for war was abroad between the kings of Syria and Israel. The king of Israel had found the wisdom of the Prophet of more worth than the might and skill of his generals, and in the Syrian camp the fame of Elisha was spread abroad, so that on a certain occasion a servant said to the king of Syria, 'Elisha, the prophet that is in Israel, telleth the king of Israel the words that thou spakest in thy bed-chamber.' This was a most emphatic confession of the common belief in the prophetic sight of the man of God, and how that he was dreaded more than the valor of the brave, or the strength of the mighty. The king would have sent forth a spy to search out the dwelling place of Elisha, but he was told that he dwelt in Dothan. 'Horses, chariots, and a great host,' were immediately prepared to go forth and surround the Prophet's dwelling by night, as the king hoped to obtain him for his cause—so foolishly do men reason when passion rules them. The host came by night and surrounded the place of the Prophet's retreat; and when the servant of the Prophet came forth at morn, he beheld the troops and trembled for the safety of himself and master. He fled to tell his master, and meeting him exclaimed—'Alas, my master! how shall we do?' how shall we escape from the power that is around us? The Prophet was undismayed, being strong in the strength of a steadfast reliance on God, and he therefore answered his trembling servant—'Fear not; for they that be with us are more than they that be with them.'

The servant was doubtless astonished by such an answer—by such a reason why he should not fear. He looked towards his master in the distance, and was fixed with amazement as he strove to penetrate the meaning of the Prophet! Elisha bowed in prayer for him. What a scene is that to contemplate! The morning light is just throwing its beams over hill and mountain, making the shadows denser in the valleys. Bathing in the light the Prophet is kneeling, the morning air is playing with his reverent locks, and gratefully fanning the face turned to the East and uplifted to the skies; his arms are stretched forth imploringly, and his whole attitude makes manifest the trusting fervor of his soul. The amazed servant steadfastly gazes upon him, yet cannot but see also the war-clad troops that surround the mountain, and his soul is filled with strange and conflicting emotions. The Syrians gaze up to the mountain where the Prophet kneels, and are awed into silence and dread as they look upon him—for they have confessed that he was not of the common mass—that he was not one to be sported with—that his was wisdom strange to them, transcending all the foresight and prudence of the most accomplished warriors in their camp. There then, are the troops, the chariots and richly clad horses, the spears of the men glittering as the rays of the sun tip them with gold;—these fill the base of the mountain. On the summit kneels the Prophet, and over against him at a short remove stands the servant, whose hopes and fears are well symbolized by the lights and shades which intermingle and are continually changing as the sunbeams play with the forms there gathered. The Prophet prays—not for himself, but for his trembling servant. He prays—'Lord! I pray thee open his eyes, that he may see.'—'And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw; and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha.' They came down to him, as snow flakes glittering in the sun fall to the earth. The young man was convinced of his master's wisdom when he told him what was for them and he feared no more the Syrians.

The Syrians were struck blind, and the Prophet led them to Samaria, where the king of Israel was. There they recovered their sight, and, behold, they were in the midst of Samaria. The king of Israel said unto Elisha, when he saw them, My father, shall I smite them? shall I smite them? And he answered, Thou shalt not smite them; wouldst thou smite those whom thou hast taken captive with thy sword and with thy bow? set bread and water before them, that they may eat and drink, and go to their master. And he prepared great provision for them; and when they had eaten and drunk, he sent them away, and they went to their master. So the bands of Syria came no more into the land of Israel.

This incident of history, like all true history, affords us good lessons touching many of our duties, reminding us of the enemies that are often surrounding us, of the worth of that spiritual vision which enables man to see the help heaven has prepared for him, and of the good of seeking the direction of a higher wisdom than the world furnishes. But the particular purpose to which I would apply it, will be discerned by the following application;—I look upon the Prophet as the Genius of Reform; I look upon the servant as a disciple of Reform; I look upon the Syrians as the tempters of those who are devoted to the cause of Reform; I look upon the opening of the eyes of the young man as the discernment given the disciple of Reform of what God has ordained to favor and aid him and his cause. I look upon the blindness of the Syrians as the confusion that often overtakes suddenly the tempters of the struggling disciples of Reform and which throws them upon the mercy of those they would enslave. I look upon the opening of their eyes by which they saw themselves in Samaria in the power of Israel's king, as the awakening of the tempters to the evils they are bringing upon themselves, the disgrace which surrounds them, and the impotence of all they possess to screen them from trials most severe. I look upon the eager desire of the king of Israel to smite the captured enemy as the proneness of men to resort to severe measures to destroy the enemies of Reform—measures which the Genius of Reform does not and cannot sanction. I look upon the spreading before the Syrians of bountiful food, their departing refreshed, and the bands of Syria coming no more into the land of Israel, as the triumphant power of kindness by which Reform can best be carried on, so that the enemy return not again.

Such are the analogies I draw from the history, and has not Truth as much to do with them as Fancy? I think so; and I deem it well to use Fancy to teach us such needed lessons—needed in this age of Reform, when tempters are busy among its disciples, when spiritual illumination is so much needed, and when men are so prone to use smiting measures to annihilate the enemy. Space forbids my dilating on each of the analogies as I should be glad to—glad to, because each one is important for us to consider, that we may feel the truths or facts taught thereby. I can only plead of the reader to permit his thoughts in the hour of leisure to ponder on them all, and by them to be made wise unto that which is good.

The Prophet is indeed a true type of the genuine Reformer. As he stands upon the mountain in the sun-light, so stands the Reformer on the firm foundation—the righteousness of his cause, in the clear light of everlasting truth. He shrinks not, nor fears, for he knows what is for him, and how weak against him is all the pride, the dazzling show, the valor and the might of the Syrians. He feels that he is surrounded with angelic hosts, and glory circles around him eclipsing the brightness of earthly grandeur and fame. The Syrians had no power to turn him to their cause, for he cared not for aught that was not honorable in the sight of heaven. And thus it should be. The moral or religious Reformer should have in his soul a love for truth and righteousness above all other loves, or he is not worthy of Christ. Firm as the mountain should his foundation be—the eternal principles of Right; and his voice should ever be strong and untrembling to cheer the unnerved disciple, and to pray for him, that he may not fall into the hands of those who would make him 'die so slowly, that none call it murder.'

In the servant rising at early morn and finding himself surrounded with enemies, I see a disciple of Reform, who awakes each day to find that the tempters to evil are not lessened. O how much he is like those struggling souls who have abandoned the maddening bowl and would keep it ever from them, but who each morn are made to tremble as they see the foes arrayed against them—the tempters that would betray and enslave them. Who does not pity the trembling young man? who does not look upon the besieging Syrians as standing in no enviable light—more shadows surrounding them than any other objects? The pride with which they are decked is nought to him who knows what it cost of blood and misery, and he would fain see them deprived of their power. It is indeed a solemn sight to see a young man going forth at morning into the world to do his duty, and advancing but a few steps ere he finds himself surrounded with the enemies of his peace, virtue, and usefulness, that would tempt him from sobriety and goodness! If he is beautiful to behold, his tempters are hideous; and their traps of iniquity are the abominations of the land, for the dead are there in living corruption. The show of pleasantness—the screens and picturings of beauty, are but as the trappings of war by which the murderous business was and is made attractive. O with the sunlight of morn let prayer be made for the tempted young—for those who are going forth into a wicked world—for those who are made to tremble as they feel they know not how to do. Look steadfast, O man, and see what is against thee; and then look steadfast again to heaven and see what is for thee. O as true as God is more powerful than man—as virtue is better than vice—as a good conscience is better than remorse—as a good name is better than riches and the esteem of the righteous than fine gold,—so true it is that there is more for thee than against thee. Tremble not, but be strong of heart; for what is against thee? Look around, aye, and within thee, and consider what is against thee. And what dost thou perceive as opposing thee in thy duty—thy devotion to virtue and God? Artificial appetites and thy tempters; these are all that is against thee; and shalt thou fear? O no; for those appetites are not good—thou wouldst conquer them; and thy tempters are weak, for all iniquity is weak; in every soul there is a Sampson strength to wrestle with and destroy any lion that comes forth against it. Turn from the Syrians, and gaze on the prophet's young man on the mountain for whom the man of God hath prayed. Look on him.

'There refreshed from Heaven,
He calms the throb and tempest of his heart.
His countenance settles; a soft solemn bliss
Swims in his eye—his swimming eye upraised;
And Faith's whole armor glitters on his limbs!
And thus transfigured with a dreadless awe,
A solemn hush of soul, meek he beholds
All things of terrible seeming, yet unmoved.'

As with him, so it may be with each who seeks to be true to God and Duty. There is more for him than can possibly be brought against him, for with every temptation there is a way of escape, that he may be able to bear it. What then is for him? We answer:

His physical constitution—the laws of its health, strength, growth and ease; his best feelings, his consciousness of duty, his convictions of the good of the complete triumph of virtuous principle, his desires for an honorable name and a good influence in society. Is not the combined force of these great and mighty? Is there any force that can compare with them for grand effects or results? No, no. The conquests of moral principle are the most glorious of all; and let him that believes it not, search history and read the ennobling recitals. O what words can describe the good effected by the combined energy of these friends of the struggling disciple of Reform! It has made an humble individual, without station or wealth, set in operation causes which have produced the most wonderful and astounding revolution, and given to him an authority before which kings have trembled and princes have shrunk away. He who has never devoted himself to the cause of Reform, does not know how much there is for him—what mighty forces are on his side—how full the mountain of his strength is of horses and chariots of fire! Ay, it is indeed true, that there is more in man for him than against him; and were it not so, the most eloquent proofs of man being a creature designed for perpetual progress would be taken from us.

God, Christ, angels, and the prayers and efforts of all good men, are on the side of the struggling disciple of goodness. O what hath the world to daunt us, compared with what God hath to encourage us—the pleadings of his love in the constitution of our being—the affections of our hearts—the aspirations that are never wholly stifled! O what hath the tempter to make us fear, to compare with what Jesus hath to give us courage—his glorious example, his devoted love, his undying sympathy—the sympathy of one tempted in all points like as we are! Angels, ever ready to sound the anthem of rejoicing over the repentant, are for us; they are ministering spirits for our salvation; they come from the bowers of Paradise to our darkened earth, whispering to us in our dreaming hours of other and happier days ere we had known so much of the world's guilt and deceit. They bend over us with hope—they hear our prayers—they watch our tears—they listen in tender sympathy to our sighs, and O how they would bless us if we would but let them. But more than all this, is for us. The prayers of the good—the efforts they are making to show us the beauty of virtue, the glory of the conquest of ourselves, and the grandeur of perpetual advancement in moral excellence,—are for us. They come as a thousand melodious voices with a hymn of praise, breathing joy, exultation, and strength into the soul, and lifting the spirit above the world—above all love or admiration for its vanities. All that the good have done—all the results they have effected, are for us; for there is inspiration therein—an inspiration we must feel the more we consider them. O is there not enough for us, ay, more than armies, riches, or power of state! The cloud of witnesses which Paul saw looking down upon the christians, are for us. Ay, more than Paul saw, for thousands of the faithful have been called to join the company he beheld. They gaze upon us with sympathy—sympathy such as the exalted never had for the Grecian racers—sympathy that would weep to see us grow faint, or turn to fear the Syrians that are against us—sympathy that bids us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith.

Let us ever remember for our encouragement in virtue, that the means which God uses to enlighten our minds with truth, are superior to those the world uses to blind us with error; and that the motives to virtue are infinitely superior to the most plausible inducements to sin. The more we study God's word, our own nature, and the structure of society, the more we shall confess these facts, and the more eager we shall be to penetrate the deep meaning of St. John when he wrote,—‘Greater is he that is in you, than he that is the world.’ ‘This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.’

O let us often meditate on the majesty and glory of Virtue, that we may work with what is ready to work for us, and be the firm, ever-improving lovers of moral excellence. The glory and majesty of Virtue are but illy recognized even by the religious world. The devotees of a repulsive theology are forever dressing her in weeds, and causing her to move before the people like a worn pilgrim, sighing for a home and sick of the roads she is required to travel. The rewards to him who follows and imitates her are mostly posthumous, as though this life could really be best enjoyed by yielding to vice. It is not so. If there be evils in the camp of Israel, they are not to be compared with the greater evils in the Syrian tents; and wo to him who grasps the apples of Sodom that turn to ashes in the grasp, and refuses therefore the golden fruit of the tree of life whose very leaves are for the healing of the nations.

They only are wise who side with virtue, and they are foolish indeed who deem her the foe of present happiness; for happiness hath been well defined as ‘the gratification of our desires within the limits assigned to them by our Creator.’ Therefore, to restrain them to these limits is the golden rule of true enjoyment, and this is the task of virtue. She ever will teach us that whatever may be the plausible good promised at the cost of transgression, it is a false good; and that if we pursue it, we may go out with rejoicing, but we shall return in tears.

Our theme has a great and solemn moral to all with respect to our social influence—direct and indirect. He that made Israel sin is condemned in the sacred record more strongly than sinning Israel; and if we pray not to be led into temptation, the spirit of our prayer should teach us not to lead others into temptation. Wo! therefore to the tempters of all grades and characters, for it shall be ill with them. The blood of others shall be on them.

NATURE'S TEMPLE.

BY IONE.

BUSILY, thoughtfully, my spirit weaves
A fairy picture of some woodland bower,
Where, through the thickly clustering forest leaves,
The sun scarce peeps throughout the summer hour!

The wild flowers, sheltered from the chilling blast,
Scarce need the light and heat of solar ray;
And the long grass bends till the breeze is past,
Like gentle spirit to affection's sway.

Enter the bower. Just purling at your feet,
A tiny stream, like thread of silver light,
Makes witching melody so soft and sweet,
It blends with the hushed voices of the night!

'Tis one of Nature's temples. God hath reared
Its counterpart on every vernal shore!
Flee from the shrine where Deity is feared,—
Kneel 'neath the emerald roof, pray and adore!

Wait not for tolling bell and moving throng,
For here all hours are holy to the heart!
And thou, except the bright-winged heirs of song,
Alone may worship and alone depart!

Render all places holy by your prayer,
And earnest love, and self-sustaining trust!
One is your father, God! whose wakeful care
Crowns you immortal, though enrobed in dust!

Praise, till eternity itself shall end,
The love that human words cannot express!
From the green earth to heaven thy tribute send,
Which, pleasing God, doth thine own spirit bless!

GOSSIPINGS OF IDLE HOURS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

HOUR EIGHT.

'SOCIAL feelings strong—inquisitive organs remarkably developed—great propensity for a well-seasoned dish of gossip, taken with strong tea! &c. etc. etc,' said my little mischief-loving, phrenological friend Emma, running her pretty fingers over my head and sadly disordering my hair; and then tying the strings of her foolish-looking, spaniel-eared hood beneath her dimpled chin, she ran away just as I was trying to tease a little heart-secret from her.

And so, I must pass this long winter evening alone. What friend shall I call down from the shelves of my little library? Milton, with his sweet, fanciful 'Comus'? Or Irving, whose quaint dreams and homestead pictures have made him the favorite of all genial hearts and generous intellects? Or shall it be one of the gentler sex—dear Miss Mitford, and her pretty village heroines, or charming Mary Howitt with her alchymic genius, changing all it touches into the rarest of gold?

Dear me! Who would have thought that in dislodging this beautiful copy of the 'American Poets,' I needed to have rattled down a half-dozen heavy octavos upon the floor! There comes M—— now, I dare say, to find out what all this noise is about. Bless me, no! it is old Uncle Moses again! How glad I am to see you, sir! You find me quite alone, and as usual, regretting my solitude.

'Alone! Young ladies who have minds and hearts, should never be alone. Thought is the most improving of all companions.'

Do you think so? Now I often find it very stupid.

'Your own fault then, daughter. It is your duty to give it a serious and instructive character; then you will never complain that solitude is irksome. But you were about to sit down to your book, were you not? A handsome volume that. Poetry, is it? Ah well, they print a deal of such stuff now-a-days, but I reckon I have buried up sweeter poetry beneath the clods of yonder church-yard than any you will find in books.'

I dare say it. And, by the way, did you not promise me, Uncle Moses, some further reminiscences of your professional life? Now is the time, if you are in a mood for it; but first, let me apologize for not having sooner offered to relieve you of your surtout. You will find it uncomfortable at the fireside.

'Well, my girl, you must assist me, for this plaguy rheumatism has taken the strength all out of my arms. But before you lay it aside, let me take something from the pocket that I may need in the course of the evening.'

Oh what a pretty little ivory box! Do let me open it, for I am as curious as Pandora. Was it dug out of a grave?

'No, dear. It contains merely a few relics of one who was very precious to my heart. You may look at them, if you wish, though they will have little interest aside from what is associated with her history, poor girl!'

Oh! a picture! How beautiful it is! What soft, melancholy eyes, and small, chiselled lips! Do tell me her story. But stop—here is something more. A lock of rich, brown hair;—how gracefully it curls, and how glossy it looks, as I hold it up to the light. She must have been a lovely creature.

'She was.'

And this was her ring, I suppose. The initials on it are H. W.

'Helen Whitman.'

What is this dark spot upon it? It looks like blood! Pray do tell me her story.

'Well, be patient a little, and I will try. When our village academy was first built—which is some twenty years ago—an advertisement was sent out in the papers for some lady qualified to take charge of the girls' department. Applicants to this office were not as numerous in those days as they are now; and only three presented themselves. One was a widow about forty years old; one a maiden lady approaching her 'fourth corner,' and the third, a young girl of seventeen, named Helen Whitman. The committee selected to examine the qualifications of the applicants were young men, and two of them unmarried. Whether this circumstance had any influence upon their decision, I will leave you, who are younger than I, to determine. It is true, however, that the two elder ladies, like most of your literary women, were remarkably homely; and that Helen was one of the most beautiful girls ever seen in our village. She was the unanimous choice; and though there were some demurrings among the prudent parents on account of her youth, the committee were resolute in declaring that her attainments were of a very superior character; and as it was an undoubted fact that much of the children's progress depended upon their attachment to their teacher, they had selected from the ladies the one who was possessed of the sweetest disposition. Some one ventured to inquire how they were so certain of this, the three candidates being equally strangers. "Why any booby might know it, or rather any body would be a booby that didn't!" answered Charles Warrenner, the youngest of the committee. "Look into her face," said he, "and see what a radiation of goodness and gentleness is there! Why, there is not a greater contrast between December and June, than there is between the stiff, dogmatical, Westminster-Catechism-look of that old maid, and the sweet, smiling, yet melancholy beauty of Helen Whitman. As for the widow, she is well enough," he continued, "but then—she is old, and homely, and has the rheumatism, and I dare say would do quite as much at grunting and groaning as she would at teaching. She looks too much like a milk-and-water character, too, to suit me." This was Charles Warrenner's reasoning, and as his reasoning was generally satisfactory to all the young ladies, it was, in consequence, to the mammas, and through their influence, to the papas; so the choice of the Committee was shortly ratified by the whole village, and Helen's star was at once in the ascendant.

'There was one circumstance, however, which had occasioned a little discussion and hesitation amongst the committee. The two elder candidates came loaded with recommendations from Doctors, Judges, and Professors; but poor Helen had not a single certificate to present, except her own sweet countenance. She made her plea, however, and it was more effectual than a thousand certificates. "Gentlemen," said she, "I have brought no recommendations. I am willing to give such testimonies of my capacities, as you have the disposition to require of me, personally. I am an orphan. I was educated by my mother; and as the place of my birth is hundreds of miles distant, and as I have no acquaintances out of that immediate vicinity, it is impossible for me to procure certificates. I have no experience as a teacher; and it will be, therefore, unsafe for you to engage me for a longer period than one quarter. Be assured, gentlemen, I shall accept no compensation for my services unless they fully meet your approval."

'The singularity of a young girl's coming "hundreds of miles," unfriended and unrecommended, and trusting to Providence and the generosity of strangers for success, together with her extreme beauty and interesting manners, was sufficient at once to enlist the heartiest sympathies of the committee. They would have engaged her for a year; but this she positively declined; and young Warrenner said he was glad, for he did not know but he might wish to engage her for himself by that time.

'As wife and I had no children, our house was thought to be more quiet and commodious than those of our neighbors, which were overstocked. We were accordingly applied to, by the committee, for board; and the next week, Helen became an inmate of our family. She soon seemed to me like a child. Her manners were extremely winning and affectionate, and overflowed with kindness to every living thing. Her scholars loved her intensely. It was not enough for them to be with her at school; they literally haunted the house when she was at home, bringing flowers and berries, and fruits in abundance, as testimonials of their true-hearted love. "Helen," I used to say to her, "how is it you contrive to make those little creatures love you so?" "Oh, no mystery at all," she would answer; "they do it as naturally as the flowers dispense their fragrance to the winds that kiss them. Knowing how much my heart is bound up in them, they cannot choose but love me a little in return."

'You remarked the melancholy of those eyes. It was not their unvarying expression, yet it was seen there often, and always when she was meditative. Her nature was full of hope and cheerfulness. Some painful circumstance could alone have induced such enduring sadness. True, she was an orphan, and to one of her affectionate disposition, this must have been a severe allotment. But she was so truly a Christian, so trustful in her religious feelings, so unwavering in her belief that all God's dispensations are for the greatest good of his offspring, that I was confident it must have been something worse than the loss of friends which could produce such abiding sorrow.

'The whole village was her admirer, and especially that portion of it embraced in the person of Charles Warrenner. He was a young lawyer of fine talents, and many personal accomplishments. He had a soul, too; as I am sorry to say all lawyers have not; though I do not join in the general crusade against the profession. Yes, Charley Warrener was as good-hearted a fellow as you will meet in a thousand; and a great admirer of beautiful and intellectual women. He had been a sort of butterfly, flitting from one pretty girl to another, half an hour in love with one, and the next moment as much engrossed with another. Some called him a trifler, but I do not think he intended any thing like flirtation. He was searching for his ideal, and he found it in Helen Whitman.

“He had a little niece who attended Helen’s school, and who soon became a great favorite with her teacher. Very frequently the little girl would come in the morning with a handful of beautiful wild-flowers, which Uncle Charles had helped her select for Miss Whitman’s herbarium; or with some rare specimen of garnet or quartz, which he trusted might find admittance to her cabinet; or a potted plant to shade her window. And if there was to be a ride, or sail, or wood-party, (which answered to modern Pic-nics) Uncle Charles usually came in person to solicit her attendance.

“Every body predicted a match; and even I saw no sufficient reason why it should not be so, especially when I observed the visible embarrassment his attentions excited in Helen. But at length, to the surprise of us all, she declined all these attentions, and as far as was possible, consistently with her situation, secluded herself from society. Her melancholy now grew deeper and more absorbing. Some violent struggle was shaking her very soul. Yet she bore it silently, and would have fain hidden it from every eye. She tried to affect gaiety; but the laugh died away upon her lips, and the tones that were meant to be cheerful, came tremulous and broken to our ears.

“Not to prolong my story, however, for I see it is getting late, I will hasten over several months, to early June of 1825. I was sitting one day in our little back parlor, by the open window. A summer-house was affixed to the window, and so completely covered with vines on every side, as to prevent all communication of sight, though not of sound, between those within and without. It was about sunset that I heard some one enter the summer-house, whom I supposed to be Helen. I was about to address her, when a second person entered, or rather, as I thought, seated himself upon the step of the door. The chair in which I was sitting was an arm-chair, and I had drawn my writing desk up so closely that it was impossible for me to retire without making sufficient noise to interrupt the conversation which had already been of too delicate a nature to be adapted to the ears of a third party. I was obliged, therefore, to become an involuntary listener to poor Helen’s narrative.

““Mr. Warrener,” she said, (for he was her companion) “I have been for months shrinking from this explanation, and should withhold it even longer, did I not feel that true affection should receive, at least, the meed of confidence. A dark cloud hangs over my destiny, and will follow me, or lead me, rather, to the grave; but there is some comfort in the thought that its shadow will rest only upon one.”

““Say not so, Helen,” interrupted Warrener, earnestly; “the darkest portion of it is already upon me, and certainly is not lessened any by my ignorance of its character. Can I be in the sunshine, when clouds are over your pathway? Never, Helen! I should disdain to be happy unless you were so!”

““You are very kind,” said Helen, in a voice struggling with her misery, “and I would to God that it were possible to spare you any portion of my suffering; it is not, however, if you love me, as I have cause to think you do. Nay, make no new protestations, Charles; they but increase the pain at my heart. And now let me ask, how much can you bear to know of Helen’s history? Will you hate her if she tells you she is a child of guilt?”

““No, Helen,” he answered, gravely, “the time for pride is gone by. No disgrace that rests upon your name, can make you less the object of my noblest love. In your own person, I am sure you are guiltless.”

““But, Charles,” she said, shuddering, “it is an awful stain that rests upon poor Helen’s name—the stain of human blood!”

““Good God! is it possible?” exclaimed he, springing to his feet. “Nay, forgive me—it was but of your agony I thought. From you nothing can make me shrink. Let me support you, dear Helen; you are faint. Lean upon my bosom this once, if it must be no more. Now, when you are quite calm, you shall tell me all, and I am sure it will be a relief to you.”

“I heard the poor girl weeping. “Oh, but for this one dreadful memory I might be so happy!” she exclaimed, in a voice that went deep into more than one soul. “Why Charles,” she said, in a sudden tone of cheerfulness, strangely at variance with the fearful import of her words, “I am the poor, miserable child of a murderer! And oh! what is a thousand fold more agonizing, the blood that he spilt, was the blood of my mother! But don’t weep, Charles,” she added, tenderly; “your sympathy makes me very strong. Look here,”—she said; “This was my mother’s bridal ring—the pledge of her husband’s undying love; see how he stained it with her blood!”

““Because he was ‘a bold, bad man’—passionate and jealous, and inebriated. He accused her of guilt, and when she knelt down, and before God protested her innocence, he struck her dead at his feet! He did not flee, but sullenly awaited his trial, confessed his guilt, and, unrepentant, ended his wretched being on the scaffold. How I lived through it all, I know not, for I loved my mother beyond all human beings; but it was God’s will that I should not die; and when I had sufficiently recovered my health and mental composure, I left my native place, and adopting my mother's maiden name, came here, where my history and parentage are unknown. I bore my grief more patiently before I learned to love you, Charles."

"But it can—it must make no difference," was the reply. "Would I not just as proudly call you my wife, in the face of the whole world, even if all knew your unhappy history? I would, Helen, and I cannot allow your scruples—I will not allow them to interrupt our happiness."

"Oh you don't know me," said Helen, very seriously. "I am alive, in every nerve, to the infamy that rests upon my name; and the mere thought that you ever could be reproached with it, would be like an undying worm at my heart. The race of a murderer must not be perpetuated. Let me fill up the last grave; for that were better, far, than to transmute the demon-blood to a generation bearing your beloved name. Charles, entreat me not. I will not stay to hear you;"—and before he could reply, she escaped into the house, and withdrew immediately to her chamber.

"I did not close my eyes to sleep that night, but lay meditating arguments with which to combat poor Helen's scruples, and induce her to marry one who was so true and generous in his love, as to be willing to brave all shame for her dear sake. I arose very early, and walked into the burying-ground, for I had a grave to dig that morning.

"Business comes in fast, now-a-days, doesn't it?" said an old neighbor, who stopped by the gate, as he was driving his cattle past. "Rather afflicting that affair that happened last night."

"What was it?" I asked. "Oh! you ha'n't heard then! Why, young 'Squire Warrener is dead! Dropped off in a fit, they suppose, for they found him dead on the floor of his room, and no signs of poison, or murder."

"It was too true. Poor Charles had fallen a victim to the violent emotion Helen's narrative, and her fixed resolution had excited. The physicians opened his chest, and found that his heart was ruptured! They never knew the cause, though they attributed it to the excitement of a pending trial, in which he was at that time deeply engaged."

And Helen?

"Oh, it is needless to say, she never rose from the prostration his sudden fate occasioned. "I too, am a murderer," she would often exclaim, in a tone of bitter self-reproach; and the morning before she died, she called me to her bedside, and requested me to dig her grave at the foot of that large elm, standing in the stream that runs through the church-yard. "It is of little consequence," she said; "but as my lot in life has been an isolated one, I would also wish my narrow bed to be somewhat apart from the crowd." And there she lies to this day, poor girl, unless the worms have eaten her."

Her dust is there, Uncle Moses, but she is in that bright and blessed country where there are no murderers. Poor Helen! she was too sensitive.

"The iniquity of the father was visited upon the child with a fearful completeness. Why is it that the innocent must suffer so intensely for the deeds of the guilty?"

"Oh we have need of patient faith below,
To clear away the mysteries of such wo!"

And yet were it not for these 'mysteries,' how could our faith be proved? Depend upon it, Uncle Moses, they will all be as clear as noon-day to our immortal visions; and till then we must content ourselves to "Know how sublime a thing it is To suffer and be strong!"

A MONODY

TO THE MEMORY OF MRS. PRISCILLA SPERRY.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

SOFT the summer sun is shining
Over lawn and landscape fair,
Floral wreaths their tendrils twining,
Cast sweet incense on the air.
Choral notes and songs of gladness,
Thrill along the leafy grove;
But there breaks a wail of sadness,
'Tis the moan of stricken love.

Orphan daughter, thou art weeping,
Thy young heart is sad and chill;
For thine earliest friend lies sleeping,
And the busy pulse is still.
Never more in fondness twining
On her lov'd neck shalt thou rest,
Or at dewy eve reclining
To her throbbing heart be prest.

When the silver star of morning
Fades in glorious light away;
Gems and pearls the flowers adorning
Glistening in the orient ray;
In thy young heart's deep devotion,
Kneeling at the spirit-shrine;
Thou shalt miss, with sad emotion
That sweet voice that blent with thine.

When the mellow rays of even
Paint the fringes of the cloud
With the rainbow dyes of heaven,
Mournful thoughts shall on thee crowd.
Thou shalt muse with tears of sadness
On the long, long vanish'd hours,
When thy every thought was gladness,
And thy path was strown with flowers.

Heavily the grief-clouds hover
Frowning o'er thy untried way;

For the pall now curtains over
Her, who was thine earthly stay.
Yet rejoice, for though her vision
Rests no more on mortal things,
She hath gain'd the bright Elysian,
Where the living fountain springs.

She hath pass'd the mystic portals
Leading to the spirit-clime,
Where the harps of bright immortals
Wake the eternal anthem-chime!
Hark, the gush of music, welling
From th' archangels' deep-toned lyre,
Joins the choral pæans, swelling
From the bright-wing'd cherub-choir.

There 'mid bowers ever-vernal,
Freed from sin, supremely blest,
Banqueting on joys supernal,
Shall the enfranchised spirit rest.
Grief, or pain, or death can never
O'er those loved realms cast a blight;
But we'll drink of life's pure river,
Flowing from the throne of light.

THE LOST MAIDEN.

BY CHARLES O. P. ELLIS.

If you raise your eyes to yonder hill, you will be struck with the peculiar architecture of the ruins which crown its summit. The taste there displayed is of a former age, and several generations successively occupied the premises. But 'the fashion of this world passeth away;' or rather it yields to fashions of a later day, and every change is supposed to be an improvement. Where are now the descendants of the last aristocratic occupant of the great house, it would be difficult to determine: but we may presume that some of them are pushing their fortunes amid the throng of cities; some are admiring the monuments of human art abroad; and others are endeavoring to distinguish themselves at the bar or in the halls of our national legislature.

But the subject of our story carries us back to simpler, and may we not say, happier times, when, instead of wearying themselves amid the bustle and turmoil of worldly life, our dramatis personæ enjoyed a little of the substantial gifts of Providence, and under the shade of some mighty oak, sat carelessly down to draw instruction or amusement from a favorite author.

It was on a warm afternoon in June that several maidens might have been seen careering over the meadow lands, recklessly trampling on the long grass and the simple flowers that vary the continual green, laughing aloud in their untamed mirth—then plunging into some thick grove where they found a relief from the burning rays of the sun. Onward they went until they mechanically directed their course to the long avenue which led directly to the house. Full of glee and noisy with mirth, they entered the large room which overlooked the avenue. But their gaiety was immediately checked; for every countenance there was downcast, and the silence of grief pervaded the hall. Mr. Rogers, the stately owner of the premises, stood with his elbow resting against the mantel-piece and his hand pressed against his forehead, while in his other he held a newspaper, which the girls did not doubt contained some tidings of unhappy import. The lady of the mansion sat in her chair, with her arms hanging listlessly by her side, and a face from which the color had fled, while her eyes were moistened with tears. As for the rest, their countenances betrayed that something had occurred of an afflictive nature. The young ladies quietly dropped into their seats without venturing to make any enquiries.

After a few moments, Mr. Rogers said: 'There seems to me to be only one hope, and that is, that the vessel has been driven by stress of weather into some port from which she will yet come forth and reach her haven in safety. But that hope is a mere straw to catch at, as we have accounts of several shipwrecks about the same time, and as nearly two months had elapsed since the ship left this country, when the Charles sailed from England. There seems to be scarcely a hope but that our daughter is lost.'

The young girls of whom we have spoken, being thus made acquainted with the cause of the melancholy they had observed, looked at each other, and several of them burst into tears.

Clarissa Rogers had been a great favorite with them all, and with every body who knew her. When her cousin, who was bound to Europe on account of ill health, proposed to her to accompany him, the plan was opposed by all her friends, who were unwilling to be, for so long a time, deprived of her society. When, at length, it was determined that she should go, a general gloom pervaded the mansion, and when she finally took leave of her friends, it was more like the parting of some condemned martyr from her relatives than the mere farewell of a young lady bound on an excursion of pleasure. No sooner had the ship sailed in which Clarissa and her cousin had embarked than every newspaper was ransacked in order to get the first tidings of the vessel; but nothing was heard of her through the public prints. This was not thought much of at the time, as in those days the Atlantic was not whitened with the sails of every nation. But when, at length, a vessel arrived in this country, which had left England two months after our adventurers, sailed with the tidings that their ship had not been heard of, there seemed real cause for apprehension; and this, indeed, was the source of the unhappiness, that now weighed down the spirits of the whole family. It was in vain that several encouraging suggestions were made. Even those who had made them did not seem to be convinced by them. Evening came, but the sound of the lute or the piano was not heard. The gay mansion was, for once, the house of sorrow, and the sun went down upon aching hearts.

In the family of Mr. Rogers was a middle aged gentleman by the name of Moore. He had been reduced to poverty from a state of affluence. Mr. Rogers having been intimately acquainted with the Moore family in better days, claimed the right to offer this last scion of that house a home and other conveniences. Moore accepted the offer without any humiliating sense of obligation, as such arrangements were, at that time, quite common in the part of the country where he resided. It was considered that the advantages of his company were a sufficient compensation for any disadvantage which might attend his reception into the house; and, indeed, the presence of Mr. Moore was, at all times, a sufficient antidote for the blues. No person could be melancholy where he was, unless indeed some overwhelming calamity had visited them. The anecdote, the repartee, the pun, the ever-ready wit of Mr. Moore rendered him a universal favorite; and he was so much so with Mr. Rogers that he would have regarded his departure as one of the worst calamities which could happen to him. Moore soon came to regard himself as one of the family. He took an interest in every thing which concerned them. Clarissa had been a great favorite of his. He had taught her many difficult pieces of music, and had largely contributed to the cultivation of her mind.

When the news from England brought doubts of her safety, he evinced his deep concern; but in a manner different from the rest of the family. They seemed to be petrified—to be wholly disabled from reasoning or acting on the subject; but Moore was aroused to vigorous action. It would be impossible for us to describe properly, the unwearied exertions, the sleepless search for information to which he subjected himself.

Not a vessel arrived from a foreign port but he was assiduous in his inquiries; he followed old seamen to their dens, and raked the lowest barracks of the city; wherever there seemed to be the slightest probability that a clue could be got to the fate of the vessel, there was Moore ready with his offers of reward to any who could give him the least hint concerning the fate of the ship. Sometimes some garrulous traveler, who asked charity at the gate, would have a story about some old sailor who had spoken of seeing a wreck at sea. Through burning suns or pelting rains, Mr. Moore would wander for hours until he found the man, only to be disappointed by some aimless tale that had no connection whatever with the subject. Whenever Mr. Moore entered the house, the eyes of all were upon him, till they saw him withdraw to some obscure part of the room, and there seat himself in sober silence. Then they knew that nothing had been discovered which could relieve their minds.

There is one person that we have, perhaps, too long neglected to introduce to the notice of the reader. That is, Henry Welton the received lover of Clarissa. Attachment more devoted than his was never known. To him Clarissa had been every thing, and we might also say that he had been every thing to Clarissa. They were peculiarly adapted for each other, and the benison of many a spectator had been pronounced upon them as they passed along, hand in hand together, on some errand of mercy to the neighboring poor. An enlarged benevolence which embraced all mankind, without distinction of sect, country, or condition, was the distinguishing mark of their minds; and with them soul seemed to answer to soul, as much so as if their union had been indeed projected in heaven.

When Henry first received intelligence that a ship had arrived from England, and that no tidings had, for so long a time, been received from the vessel in which Clarissa embarked, he looked as if he was but little affected by the news. It was impossible for him to bring himself to believe that there was anything alarming in the affair.

'Two months!' cried he—'surely that is not such a very long passage. Many things may have prevented her from reaching port in a less time.'

But as he witnessed the doubts and the fears of others; as he saw that every other person imagined there was cause for alarm, his confidence gradually gave way, and when he did really give up to despondency, the consequences were dreadful. He refused to be comforted. He wandered alone through the woods and over the rocks, indulging his grief in solitude, and it seemed to some persons that he would actually lose his reason. Mr. Moore sought him out, and endeavored to cheer him with hopes that they would yet hear of Clarissa's safe arrival in England. 'Remember,' said he, that other vessels must arrive soon, and why despair, when the very next arrival may bring the news that the ship is safe in England. Wait, Welton, wait and hear the next tidings.'

This advice was good for a desperate case; but on the present occasion it was rather unfortunate than otherwise; for even while he spoke, the post-boy handed Moore a newspaper which contained the account of the arrival of another ship from England, ten days later than the other, and the following lines met the eye of the reader; 'Great anxiety now prevails with regard to the fate of the Two Brothers which ship should have reached this port some five weeks ago. The friends of those on board are plunged in the greatest distress.' The quick eye of the lover saw the color change in the cheek of Moore, and he, at once, insisted on examining the newspaper for himself. He did so, and then with a look of overwhelming anguish, he said. 'Did I not tell you so? All your inquiries will only go to confirm our worst fears. I feel that there is no hope, and why should I ever indulge in it? Clarissa is lost, and as for me, the world has not a single charm remaining. All is over!'

A day or two afterward, Mr. Moore received word that there was an old sailor living in a little cottage; not far distant, who had returned lately from sea, and who had thrown out some mysterious hints about a piracy which had been committed on the high seas, and about a woman who had been among the sufferers. Moore immediately made Welton acquainted with this rumor, and, without difficulty prevailed on Welton to accompany him to the place where the seaman was to be found.

They set out together on a fine cool morning, and after a walk of two miles reached an old ruined house, at the foot of a wooded hill, and surrounded by bleak and barren rocks, which had been pointed out as the residence of the sailor.

Moore rapped at the door, and a female voice within, cried in no very pleasant tone, 'what do you want?'

'Good morning!' vociferated Moore—'does Ben Roundcastle put up here?'

A murmur of voices was heard a moment within, and then a girl opened the door. As the rickety door was opened, it came off its hinges, if hinges it could be said to have, and but for the timely interposition of Moore would have fallen upon the head of the girl. As it was, it went clattering to the floor, and ground an earthen dish to powder. Instead of thanking Mr. Moore for rescuing her girl, the woman of the house fell into a violent passion with her visitors for 'breaking in the door,' as she termed it. The two gentlemen were, however, too intent upon the object of their visit to be much annoyed by her clamor. They saw before them a stout short man, in seaman's apparel, sitting in a large chair with one arm, and his right leg elevated on another chair of more humble pretensions. His countenance had been naturally ugly, but exposure to the elements had given it an exceeding hard and forbidding aspect. Between his lips was the stem of a long Dutch pipe, and ever and anon as he opened his lips to let the smoke escape, he disclosed a set of the worst and blackest teeth that ever deformed poor human nature. 'We have called to see you,' said Moore, 'on a subject to us of the greatest consequence, and if a couple of dollars would be any object to you, here they are.'

At first the man had looked at them with great indifference. At mention of the dollars, his eyes glowed; at sight of them, he seemed still more moved. He coolly put the money into his pouch, and then awaited what farther his visitors should have to say.

'We have lost a dear friend—a young lady—who set sail in the Two Brothers, and desire to get some information of her.'

'I guess you've mistook this house for the fortune-teller's,' returned the sailor. 'We don't do such things here,' and he continued to puff out his tobacco smoke with the greatest coolness imaginable.

'Oh! no,' returned Moore, 'we knew that you had been at sea; and we have understood that you knew something about a piracy that was committed on the high seas.'

Here Mr. Moore laid down five dollars upon the broad arm of the chair; but it seemed to produce no impression upon the sullen seaman. He assumed an air of invincible silence and secrecy. It appeared that the knowledge of this piracy was the great acquirement upon which he grounded his importance, and his visitors were doomed to the infliction of this kind of vanity, with all its silence, coldness, and gloom.

Neither Moore nor Welton doubted that their secret lay concealed under all this reserve, and they were extremely anxious so to deport themselves as not to give offence to the sailor.

At length, Moore ventured to say, 'We have heard that you were concerned in—that is, that you were acquainted with the circumstances of a piracy.'

The sailor gave a sidelong glance at the speaker, and then with great non chalance, arose, went to the closet, took out some tobacco from a curious skin, filled his pipe, lighted it and sat down again, with the air of a man who knows something that all the world does not know. He now sat with his eyes fixed full upon his visitors. The five dollars remained untouched, and there seemed little prospect that any communication would be made.

Trembling with impatience, Welton then proceeded to speak, 'If money is any object, you shall be supplied plentifully with it.'

'Are you any relation to the lady who was lost,' inquired the sailor.

'She was—very near to us,' replied Moore; but Welton had caught at the word 'lost,' and inquired in a tone of despair whether the lady were indeed lost!

The sailor now suddenly set out, on the full run, with his story: 'When I was running down the coast in the Betsey, we fell in with a brig in distress. She had been boarded by pirates—'

'Pray tell me how long ago this was,' interrupted Moore.

'Let me tell my story in my own way,' cried the other. 'It was twelve years ago last September; well, as I was saying—'

'No matter—no matter!' cried Moore and Welton in a breath. Your pirate story can be nothing to us.' The two men then hurried from the house, weary and disgusted.

Such were the adventures to which poor Moore was frequently subjected. Such were the disappointments which he endured.

With respect to poor Welton, he went home more melancholy than ever. He had never before experienced one of these shocks. On that very afternoon, Welton went forth to take his sad stroll in the woods. He wandered farther than usual and came upon the precincts of Hermit Clarendon before he was aware whither his footsteps tended. The hermit was well known to everybody in the neighborhood. He was a man who had seen great affliction, and who had sought the solitude of the forest, not from any distaste of human society, but because he could no longer take any interest in mundane affairs. He was stooping over to gather roots as Welton came with slow step, pondering on his way, and with a countenance wrapped in speechless sorrow. As soon as Welton perceived that he was in the vicinity of a human being, he would have retired; but the hermit suddenly arose and fixing his eyes upon the young man, said, 'Look not upon the wine when it is red.'

Welton was surprised and puzzled by this singular manner of address. Curiosity is a powerful passion of the human mind, and Welton would fain know to what this oracular beginning would lead. He, therefore, remained stationary, and said, 'Pray, sir, why are these words addressed to me?'

'Because I perceive that you are pressed down by no common griefs,' returned the hermit, advancing and taking the hand of Welton to lead him into the shade, 'and many men of intellectual greatness and keen sensibility, have grasped the flowing cup when they would dissipate the cloud that obscures their spirits. The draught becomes deeper and deeper, until that which, in the first instance, was a medicine, becomes the destroyer of body and mind.'

Welton stood speechless. He looked with surprise upon the hermit. This was not the manner in which he had been comforted by others; and on that very day he had been tempted to drown his despair in a goblet of ardent spirits.

'Believe me,' said the hermit, 'I do not imagine that you have had recourse to so dangerous a remedy. I spoke by way of caution.'

'What is your remedy?' said Welton, with slight confusion and casting his eyes on the ground.

'Nothing short of a firm belief in an over-ruling Providence, and a hope in a glorious futurity,' said the other. 'Calm reason is an anodyne for the wounds of the mind; but the philosophers have begun at the wrong end. They have reasoned, and they have reasoned only. To make reason effective to the cure of sorrow, it must be a handmaid to faith in God, and a reliance upon his wisdom and goodness. Then reason becomes a comforter indeed—otherwise it is as a dark lantern; its sentiments may be glorious, but their radiance is not shining out and enlightening our path.'

'That may be well for religious people,' returned the young man; 'but I am even now a mere worldling and a sinner.'

'Oh! slow of faith,' said the other, 'it is the direct path to regeneration. For sinners the fountain of life and immortality is opened; and do you suppose that you would be more of a sinner if you contemplated the Divine perfections? On the other hand a love of holiness would thus be begotten in your mind, and you would embrace the truth in the love of it, not to escape punishment.'

'Alas!' said Welton, 'must I hear this from every quarter? Is there no other way of healing a wounded spirit? Many of those who speak as you do, have experienced affliction, and then they have wept and sighed in the same manner as mere worldly men. Why should they recommend a balsam which proves so inefficient in their own case?'

The hermit remained silent a short time, and without answering immediately the question of the youth, he then said, 'The spirit of unbelief pervades the hearts of many who talk well on the subject of religion. It is one thing to have a fashionable belief in God and his Providence, and quite another thing to dwell with God continually. We know not what the mind is capable of until we have exercised its loftiest powers, which lie dormant, oftentimes, through our negligence. Unless we make religion our chief good, we cannot expect to experience its consolations.'

The young man appeared struck with the last words of the hermit; and as the sun had already reached the horizon, he took his leave of him. On his way home he pondered deeply on what he had heard, nor did he close his eyes in sleep that night until he had reason to believe that he had experienced something of the power of faith on his mind.

Months passed away, and Welton had looked to the proper source of hope and comfort. He had found that true religion was no such dull and spiritless affair as he had once supposed it to be. He found that resignation to the Divine will was attended with peace and joy, and although he still mourned for Clarissa, yet it was with the expectation of a happy re-union when the brief storms of life were past, and real existence commenced. He loved to visit the house dedicated to the worship of the Supreme Being, and to read the Scriptures, whose pages seemed radiant with light; but chiefly it was his delight to hold silent communion with his Maker, when no eye was upon him but that of the Omnipotent.

Welton's worldly business prospered exceedingly, and he found himself in possession of wealth which he could be scarcely said to have sought. Such being his condition, he was advised by his friends to take a wife. His reply was, 'There can be little doubt that Clarissa is now beyond the reach of mortal fear and hope; and thus, according to the rules of human propriety, I am free to choose some other woman for a wife. But my regard for her was not founded upon mere personal convenience. She was a woman whom I can never cease to admire, and although her spirit may, long since, have ascended to its Creator, yet I entertain the hope that my spirit may ascend there also, and that a happy meeting between us will heal the griefs that her loss has occasioned.'

More than two years had now passed away, since the departure of Clarissa. Her family had entirely given her up. Her name was mentioned only as one who was lost to them forever. The arbor devoted to her use had fallen to ruin, and little more than a heap of rubbish remained of it. The exertions of Mr. Moore had long since ceased. He had given up all further inquiries in despair. Welton pursued his ordinary business, while deep in his heart was buried his love for the lost and mourned. Nor was it he alone who cherished in secret a vivid remembrance of the absent one. Her aged father missed the solace of his declining years, and his cheek bore witness to the struggles which he endured within. The mother of Clarissa bore her grief in silence, yet who can estimate the pangs which rend the heart of a bereaved mother? Although given up as lost, no one had forgotten Clarissa.

It was on a pleasant summer evening in August, when Welton and Moore stood, talking, on the front steps of Mr. Rogers' house. Their conversation was of an ordinary cast, and would have little interest for the reader. They both turned as they heard a light step near them, and then a young woman passed up the steps between them. They did not observe any thing peculiar in her manner or appearance; and supposing it to be a visitor who had called to see Mrs. Rogers, they continued their conversation as if nothing had occurred. The stranger had not been long in the house, before Moore's quick ear detected a slight bustle in the front parlor. A low shriek as of joy and surprise soon followed. Loud exclamations were next uttered; and the two men, without speaking, now entered the house hastily to ascertain the cause of this unusual excitement. The first thing they beheld when they entered the room, was Mrs. Rogers supported by her husband. She had fainted, but was fast reviving.

'Henry!' cried a voice near Welton. He turned, and behold! his long lost Clarissa hastening to embrace him. We will not dwell on the scene between Clarissa and Welton. The latter could scarcely believe but that he was dreaming, so strange, so new and unexpected was the meeting; yet, if a dream, it was one fraught with so much happiness that he hoped he should never awake from it. But it was no dream—it was Clarissa herself that stood before them; at least, it was evident that Mr. Moore thought so, by the way in which he danced about the room, and 'shouted for joy.' The servants came rushing into the parlor from all parts of the house, and the rolling wheels of carriages soon after were heard in the distance, as the friends of the family hastened to embrace and to welcome home the beloved of many hearts.

As soon as the tumult of joy had, in some measure subsided, Clarissa was called upon to give some account of her long absence, and the adventures which must have befallen her in the mean time.

Her story was soon told. On leaving port in the 'Two Brothers,' every thing promised a pleasant passage to England. Hilarity and perfect contentment reigned on every side. Her cousin was very kind and attentive to her while she moved over an element so novel to her; but which now appeared to be unattended by any of those dangers about which she had so often heard and read. But she little knew the nature of the fickle element. She was soon to see the ocean in a different guise. On the tenth day out, she could not but be sensible that the size of the billows increased. A heavy swell caused the ship to roll and pitch violently, and it was with great difficulty that the passengers could keep their feet, either on deck or in the cabin. This appeared to give no alarm to the Captain, who said that such things were of frequent occurrence. But soon afterwards, the wind increased so much that it was thought necessary to reef the topsails and take in the loftiest canvass. The gale continued to increase, and now the sea appeared to be a mass of foam, while the air was darkened with the spray. The vessel was hove to under staysails, and drifted wherever the sea and the wind carried her.

The Captain told the passengers that these gales were very common, and that, in a few days, the weather would be pleasant again; but day followed day, and no change took place. The wind seemed rather to increase, and there was soon observed a gloomy cloud upon the countenance of the Captain—a look of anxiety which added greatly to the uneasiness of all on board. After the gale had lasted a considerable time, the Captain found, by his reckoning, that the ship was approaching the northern coast of America. He endeavored to get a little sail on the ship; but as soon as it was loosed, the wind carried it away. It was now evident that their situation was becoming dangerous. Some of the passengers went to prayer, while one or two of them endeavored to drown their fears by increasing their daily potations. The sailors were observed huddled together about the mainmast, conversing, with ominous looks.

It was however hoped that the wind would lull in time to escape the land. No such auspicious event took place, and it was near midnight when the vessel struck a rock with so much force as to throw several passengers from their berths. A scene of confusion ensued, which baffles description. The vessel was driven clear of the rock, and fast hurried toward the shore. She was brought up by a reef which extended a considerable distance along the shore, and here she went to pieces in a short time. About half the passengers and crew got safely on shore, and the rest, together with the first mate, perished.

How Clarissa reached the shore, she could not tell; but when she came to her recollection, she perceived that she was in a hut with an aged Indian squaw, and her cousin bending over her. A pitch knot was burning in the apartment, and threw its lurid glare over the furniture of the hovel, disclosing the presence of nets and other apparatus for fishing.

On this bleak and barren coast, Clarissa and her cousin had remained, together with the other survivors, waiting for the appearance of a vessel in the offing. In these days they would not have waited long, but at that time a vessel was seldom seen on the coast. At length, however, a ship appeared. A large fire was kindled on a hill near the sea-shore, and the ship sent a boat to the aid of the sufferers. She proved to be an English vessel bound to Amsterdam. After being on board this ship about two weeks, she fell in with a ship bound to America. On board of her the passengers were put, and they reached a southern port in safety. From thence Clarissa and her cousin set out for home, where they had both arrived.

This story was listened to with intense interest, and Welton could not but admire the goodness of Providence to himself in preserving the beloved of his soul through so many dangers, and restoring her to him in health and in safety.

Morning light dawned before the friends of Clarissa thought of retiring. Soon afterward her name was changed to that of her lover, and he led his bride to the comfortable mansion which he now possessed, being firmly persuaded that Heaven rewards those who put their trust in Him.

TO AN AGED TREE.

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

OLD tree, in childhood's sunny hours,
I've played beneath thy shade,
Weaving bright wreaths of summer flowers—
I thought they would not fade!
And then I've watched above to see,
The robin build her nest,
And laughed aloud with noisy glee,
When warmly made and drest.

Old tree, when somewhat older grown,
With book in hand, how oft,
I've sat me at thy foot alone,
While sung the lark aloft.
And many a lesson conned with care,
And many a tale well read,
Bore witness to the hours that there
So pleasantly were sped.

Old tree, beneath thy faithful shade,
Confiding friendship grew—
O could'st thou tell of all that made
Youth clothed with gladsome hue,
Thou would'st a lengthened tale reveal
Of happy days now flown—
Of joys that I no more may feel,
Of friends from earth now gone!

Old tree, sad changes have been made
And others are to come,
Since one who dwelt beneath thy shade,
Has gone to his long home.
At early morn, or eve no more
His steps to thee shall wend,
Earth's joys and sorrows now are o'er
To him, my earliest friend!

Old tree, the home where year from year,
Thy branches waved above,
Made sacred by affection's tear—
Where children dwelt in love,
Is home no more, and strangers feet
Now tread those much loved halls,
And unknown voices come to greet
The traveler, to its walls.

Old tree, they say thou too must fall!
I would it were not so,
For oh to me thou dost recall
Deep thoughts of joy and wo.
I would that thou might'st still remain,
Though all is changed around—
I would that we might meet again
On that much hallowed ground.

Old tree, farewell! for never more,
Mine eyes shall love to see,
Thy branches waving proudly o'er,
The home so dear to me.
Well, be it so, for thou wert part
Of what has passed away,
And though thy fall makes sad my heart,
I will not bid thee stay.

'I WOULD NOT LIVE ALWAY.'

THE mind of man ardently clings to life. Yet notwithstanding this, there is a feeling that ever and anon comes welling up from the soul's deep fountains, and in its fullness gives utterance to the above quoted sentiment. There is not that here below which can fully satisfy the cravings of the soul. It longs for more knowledge—to know and feel the glorious realities of another and a brighter world. It pants for joys of a more elevated character—even for the mingling together of the 'white vested elders' and the angels around the throne of Omnipotent Love.

More particularly is this the case, when we witness the sinfulness of man, and then contrast it with the holiness, the spotless purity of that 'better land' on high. It is then we feel, that—'We would not live alway away from our God;

 Away from yon heaven, that blissful abode;
 Where the rivers of pleasure flow o'er the bright plains,
 And the noontide of glory eternally reigns.'

The constant intermingling of light and shade which we experience, is the lot of mortality; and many are the darkening shadows thrown athwart our pathway, that tend to wean the mind from all things of a sublimary nature. Here sin, with all its luring wiles, leads many a victim astray, dragging them down from the lofty heights of innocence and virtue, to the vile and degraded haunts of iniquity and misery. And when we see man thus prostrating his noble powers at such a shrine, and giving their unhallowed worship to the base idols of time and sense, the mind is led to look forward with fond anticipations to the time, when washed in the blood of the Lamb, purified from every stain, the whole family of man shall appear before the throne of God, to worship there, with the countless myriads of His creation. We feel then that we would not live alway, and that willingly, yea, joyfully when our summons comes, can we pass through the dark valley and shadow of death, fearing no evil, for the rod and staff of Jehovah will be with us even then; and the eye of faith soaring onward and upward, sees

'—on Canaan's happy shore,
 A pure and countless band,
 Whose conflicts and whose toils are o'er,
 In glorious order stand.'

And there is no sun there, no night, no unhappiness; but all of that white robed immortal host are as the angels at God's right hand.

Again;—here below is death, and the separation of those dear to each other as their own existences. The hold that we retain upon our friends is indeed feeble, and the ties that have so secretly bound heart to heart, in one reciprocal bond of love and affection, are never too strong to be broken. In the eloquent language of another, 'Tears were never known to move the king of terrors; neither is it enough that we are compelled to surrender one, two, or many of those we love; for though the price is so great we buy no favor with it, and our hold on those that remain is as frail as ever.' It is indeed a melancholy thought to reflect on what we are in this great world of change and sorrow, of meeting and of parting. Yet it is a joy-inspiring truth, and one that comes home to the heart with thrilling power, that in heaven there will be meetings with no partings, joy with no sorrow, and there will be no death of the beautiful, the young and the pleasant; there no one will be called to part with their loved jewels, for in the presence of God there is fullness of joy, and at his right hand are evermore pleasures for every child of humanity. There, says the Apostle, we shall see face to face, and know even as we are known. Then who would live alway away from that bright glorious land,—away from that celestial choir, whose songs of praise are constantly ascending up as incense pure and holy before the throne of Omnipotence? Who would forever go on, struggling amid the toils and crosses of life, with no hope of futurity,—no hope of a better existence when this mortal drapery that now envelopes us, shall moulder back to its native elements?

I have felt when witnessing the sinfulness of man, and the pain and sorrow here on earth, as though I could pillow my weary head in the silent chambers of death; and 'the world forgetting, be by the world forgot.' I have thought that it would indeed be a blessed thing to die. And at such times have I regarded the work of death as an angel ministry, bringing us tidings from a far off country; and that country a heavenly land where tears shall be wiped from sorrow's weeping eye, and every pain shall cease. I can but think that wrong education has done much to clothe death in a gloomy and forbidding garb. But I thank God that these feelings are fast doing away; and I most sincerely hope that the time will soon come, when they will flee to eternal oblivion, from which they will never emerge. Yet, it cannot be wondered at, that death is regarded with so much terror by those who entertain the cold and cheerless sentiment, that a large portion of the human family are exposed to an endless existence of pain and sorrow, for they know not, but that they themselves shall ere long feel the fiery 'spray of hell' dashing violently upon them. But when death is viewed as a messenger that comes to bear us to a heavenly home, to our Father and our God, we can then welcome its approach, we can go home rejoicing, rejoicing in the hope of a glorious immortality beyond the confines of the tomb.

SPEAK NOT THAT WORD.

STAY, stay that word,—O, speak it not,
 Give it not form nor breath;
 It is with secret venom fraught,
 To work a certain death.

Unmeaning was it?—is this true?
 Why, then, should it be spoken?
 Is't not designed to wound, anew,
 A heart that has been broken?

Smile-lighted?—ah, destructive flash!
 Is not the tempest's wrath
 As dread as if electric crash
 Marked not its fearful path?

That meek and shrinking spirit wears
 Marks of deep suffering;
 Within itself, submissive, bears
 Of grief, a close-sealed spring.

With careless hand touch not the seal,
Lest drops of bitter woe
Condensed, leak out;—kind words that heal
To stricken hearts should flow.

Long has the world with buffeting,
That chastened spirit worn;—
Speak not that word, but kindly bring Balm for the hearts that mourn.

PROGRESS TOWARDS TRUTH:

OR THE TWO FRIENDS.

CHAPTER VI.*

'THE love of God! oh it is infinite
Even as our imperfection. Promise, child,
That thou wilt love him more and more for this.'

'I'm glad I suffer for my faults;
I would not, if I might, be bad and happy.'

ELLINOR kept her promise to meet Mary on the morrow, and early she left home to spend the day with her friend. The morning was beautiful; and when she had reached the brow of Alford's Hill, she paused and looked abroad over the vast scene. Many times had she paused thus at night to gaze upon the stars, and joyed to see how they braided a net work of light upon the sleeping stream; but never had she been prompted to pause thus at day in solemn mood. She had loved nature intensely, but now she confessed as she had never before confessed the presence of Deity! She felt a new impulse—an impulse to associate thoughts of God with all that was bright and beautiful around her, for now He was to her Unshadowed Light. Now the dew drop that hung tremulously on the flower or the grass blade, seemed to tremble with that great thought, and the richness of every form of loveliness, was to her the radiation of the same truth. To live, was now a great blessing. The simple consciousness that she was able to think, was inexpressibly joyous; and when she attempted to utter her thanks, her feelings were too mighty for utterance—she 'mused His praise!'

Lightly as a fawn Ellinor pursued her walk, and was soon heartily greeted by her friend. A long day was before them, and they anticipated much and rich and pure enjoyment. Mary was all ready to sit down with her visitor in the pleasant 'study' beside the open windows through which came the sweet breath of morn and the mingling rural sounds from mill, stream, garden, and field. Ellinor related to Mary her conversation with Clara, and that she had thought upon all her cousin had offered with the deepest consideration of which she was capable.

'I am resolved, Mary,' she added, 'to be firm in the pursuit of Truth, and to use all the intellect I possess to obtain the prize. I do not believe—I cannot believe, God will curse any of his creatures for receiving even error, when they have striven to arrive at truth.'

'You are right, Ellinor,' responded Mary. "The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord," we are told; and surely if we use a candle with all the care we are able to command, and should chance to stumble, I do not think any being of rectitude would condemn and curse us for stumbling—do you?'

'I am sure I don't,' said Ellinor, 'and I'll not think of such a thing in reference to my heavenly Father.'

'We should not,' replied Mary; 'for why is it that we love old lady Hall so well? Is it not because she never was harsh in her judgments upon us, when, after severe study, we failed to discover the truth, or chanced to misinterpret an author?'

'O yes, certainly! What a dear, good teacher she was!' most earnestly said Ellinor.

'But after all, Ellinor, I think there is no danger of adopting error if we pursue the course we contemplated. If we obtain a correct knowledge of Deity, we shall be sure of the truth. We judge actions according to what we know of persons, and a great deal depends on accurate knowledge of persons, in forming correct opinions of conduct. Many things done by our mothers seemed harsh to us in childhood till we reflected on our estimation of what they were to us, and in the faith of childhood we regarded those things as right, however mysterious. And as now, with better knowledge, we look back on the past, we feel that our only want is to have towards God the feelings or affections we cherished towards our mothers in childhood. No mystery in his providence, or in his word, would then cast a shade over our perfect faith in the good of everything.'

'O,' exclaimed Ellinor, 'O that I could look up to heaven and think of God as I think of my sainted mother there! She never erred from the spirit of love, and when she seemed the severest, I know now she was as kind as when she seemed the tenderest. I well remember one time when I had done something wrong against which she had warned me, she punished me as she said she should; and as she did it, I saw her once turn away her face from me, and in a mirror that hung on the wall, I caught sight of her eyes—they were filled with tears, and her lip trembled while it was wreathed with grief. O how I did hang upon her neck! how I did weep! Never, never did I doubt after that that there was true love even in the infliction of punishment.'

'If people would remember more such things,' said Mary, 'it would not only enable parents to be more successful in disciplining their children, but cause them to cast aside as folly the common remarks about justice being distinct from mercy. Their own true affections would be to them the interpreters of the love of God, as a drop of the ocean has the same qualities as the aggregate of the waters. There is one good thought at least among the much laughed at "Orphic Sayings"—"Love is the Source of Knowledge." I am sure it is the source of much spiritual knowledge; for many a person has experienced a great change in theological opinions by becoming a parent. A new sentiment was awakened, and a new power was added to thought. The Romans could not appreciate the beautiful mythology of the Greeks, for it was too pure for them—they had nothing developed within them that was as an interpreter of the poetic symbols.'

'Yes, I have noticed that at school,' responded Ellinor, 'when our class was reading some description of disinterestedness or noble self-sacrifice. Those who were notoriously selfish, ambitious and envious, did not relish it like others, and there was not the glow on their countenances which gave the beauty of enthusiasm to the features of others.'

'Let me read a good illustration of this' said Mary, 'and we shall see the importance of taking care of our feelings and affections if we wish to obtain the truth. There are many who cannot understand how it is that some are willing that all should "go to heaven"—they think there could be no joy to them if such were the case and all should be saved. They are deficient in love—they have no expansive sympathies.'

'True,' said Ellinor, 'but what is the illustration you referred to?'

'O here it is,' said Mary; and in quoting it I may remark that it also gives us a reason why Shelley rejected a nominal Christianity as he did. He rejected it because as it was presented to him, it had no sympathy with the expansive affections of his heart, yet he had great admiration for the moral principles of Jesus Christ. But to the extract—hear it;—'Shelley, at the gates of Pisa threw himself between Byron and a dragoon, whose sword in his indignation was lifted and about to strike. Byron told a common friend, sometime afterwards, that he could not conceive how any man living should act so. "Do you know that he might have been killed, and there was every appearance that he would be?" The answer was, "Between you and Shelley there is but little similarity and perhaps but little sympathy; yet what Shelley did then, he would do again, and always. There is not a human creature, not even the most hostile, that he would hesitate to protect from injury at the hazard of his life. And yet life, which he would hazard so unguardedly, is somewhat more with him than others; it is full of hopes and aspirations, it is teeming with warm feeling, and it is rich and overrun with its own native simple enjoyments. In him every thing that ever gave pleasure gives it still, with the same freshness, the same exuberance, the same earnestness to communicate and share it."

"By heaven! I cannot understand it!" cried Byron; "a man to run upon a naked sword for another!"'

'That is a singular illustration and a good one, certainly,' said Ellinor. 'I have read some of Byron's poems, but I never met with any thing that betokened that he had any real self-sacrificing love. No wonder he could not understand the noble action of his friend.'

'But this friend could understand a similar act performed by another,' added Mary. 'And many with such a willingness to do good—to sacrifice self, have, through the force of that philanthropy, rejected the corruptions of Christianity. Let us then, as we search for truth, aim to keep active within us right affections, otherwise pride will rebel against the words of Jesus, and whereas we acknowledge God to be Love, we may lean to interpretations of his government which shall deny this truth. O our Master uttered a great promise when he said—"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God!" Pure in heart! free from the impurities of selfishness and pride; such shall have a correct intuitive perception of God.'

'O that my heart was pure that I might see God!' said Ellinor, fervently.

'Let us kneel,' said Mary 'and ask of God to give us of his good spirit, for graciously has he said that if any lack wisdom, let them ask, and liberally will it be given them, without upbraiding for misimprovements of supplies in the past.'

They knelt—one arm around each other's neck, and the other hands closely clasped. Less firm was the outward union than the inward; heart beat with heart and soul blended with soul. There in that holy room, they prayed—for the spirit of Ellinor responded to every word uttered by Mary. They prayed—not for the too common desires of the young—not for wealth, for beauty, or for pleasure, but for goodness and truth! There was no agony of soul as is known by those who tremble before Omnipotent Wrath, nor was there terror as in those who regard Deity as having so hated humanity as to doom man to utter woe, but in their hearts was solemnity and profound awe mingled with the feelings that bring naturally to the lips the words—'Our Father who art in Heaven!' and that hallow in the depths of the being his holy and reverend name. They prayed in earnestness of spirit and in true affection of heart. Theirs was a prayer for Truth as the most desirable of all good. Truth the light of heaven, the smile of angels, the sunshine of mind, the glory of God.

Who can marvel that they found the Truth? that they entered with quick and joyous step upon the path which shineth brighter and brighter unto the perfect day? They had the great idea 'God is Love,' and the earnest and prayerful desire after what is right, kept it in constant activity, and it brooded over the chaos of thought till at length a beautiful, harmonious and permanent fabric rose.

Too little attention, we fear, is given in this Age of Excitements, to the proper method of inquiry into scriptural and religious truth. There is too much dependence placed on times and seasons—too much declamation to terrify and overwhelm, and too little respect for Mind. In the desire for immediate results, the greatest good is sacrificed. Amid excitement—with the weight of terrific images and descriptions pressing upon the mind, an individual is not in a right state to form any opinion. They cannot 'prove all things,' and they know not what it is that they 'hold fast' to, when they grasp a creed to take away the weighty fear; and therefore we frequently meet with those who have signed a long list of articles, but now that they are calm and rational, they cannot explain the sense of hardly one of them; and should they attempt an explanation of two, they will be sure to set forth a contradiction. 'A house divided against itself cannot stand.'

The spirit of Truth shall guide you into all Truth. This is a gracious assurance. But how shall we obtain the spirit of Truth? By freeing our minds as far as possible from all biases which prevent the exercise of true candor; by a cherished consciousness of our liability to err and of the worth of openness of heart to receive truth wherever it flows from; and a sincere effort to apply whatever we can apply to the practical in life.

Try the spirits whether they are of God. Penetrate beyond the letter of a doctrine or proposition, and see what is the character of the spirit. Reason upon the influence of that spirit, supposing it to have complete sway in the individual and in the social. What kind of a man, and what order of society, would its legitimate operation make? The real character of a doctrine is not to be tested by the character of its professors, but by the legitimate results to which its spirit tends; for two persons may believe the same doctrine, and one may be true goodness and the other iniquity itself. Should the doctrine they believe have a perfect dominion in them, they would be morally alike, as surely as effects are qualified by their causes. But even the truth may be held, like a light in a dark lantern, in unrighteousness, and give forth no illumination, no beauty, whereas in another case it may be like sunshine in dew—

'A crown of crystal in an ivory chest.'

We should have reason in respect to doctrines as to questions in a science—Chemistry for instance; take the elements given and ask nothing but—what is the result of the combination or action of these? Accept whatever is the actual result—for that and that alone is the truth.

We could wish that all might have as lovely and enchanting a vision of Truth as 'O Rare Ben Jonson' had when he sketched her picture.

Upon her head she wears a crown of stars,
Through which her orient hair waves to her waist,
By which believing mortals hold her fast,
And in those golden cords are carried even
Till with her breath she blows them up to heaven.
She wears a robe enchased with eagle's eyes,
To signify her sight in mysteries;
Upon her shoulder sits a milkwhite dove,
And at her feet do wily serpents move;
Her spacious arms do reach from east to west,
And you may see her heart shine through her breast:
Her right hand holds a sun with burning rays,
Her left a curious bunch of golden keys;
With which heaven's gates she locketh, and displays
A crystal mirror hanging at her breast,
By which men's consciences are searched and drest:
On her coach-wheels hypocrisy lies racked,
And false-eyed slander, with vain glory backed,
Her bright eyes burn to dust; in which shines fate:
An angel ushers her triumphant gait,
Whilst with her fingers fans of stars she twists,
And with them beats back error, clad in mists;
Eternal unity behind her shines,
That fire and water, air and earth combines.
Her voice is like a trumpet, loud and shrill,
Which bids all sounds in earth and heaven be still.

THOUGHTS ON SACRED POETRY.

BY REV. GEORGE ROGERS.

HAVING just completed the compilation of a new hymn-book, my uppermost inclination is to say something on the subject of hymns, and poetry in general. I had supposed myself tolerably conversant with the hymns in use amongst the various orders of christians before I engaged in the work aforesaid. During its progress, however, I became convinced that there is extant a much larger amount of excellent sacred verse than I had supposed. Every thing, it would seem, within the range of christian contemplation, has been made the subject of sacred song. Several reasons will account for this. 1st. The very general propensity in mankind to poetise. 2d. The fervency of religious feeling is particularly inclined to vent itself in that way. And 3d. Hymns may be produced, and in tolerable excellence too, by persons of very ordinary poetic talent—real poets may well be supposed to have too much genius for that sort of compositions—they are apt, from an over-exuberance of fancy, to be beguiled into flights of too gay a nature for the gravity of devotional verse. John Newton, who was also of this opinion, (and from whom, indeed, I may, unconsciously, have borrowed it) says in the preface to his 'Olney Collection,' that 'there is a style and manner suited to the composition of hymns, which may be more easily, at least more successfully attained by a versifier than by a poet. They should (he observed) be hymns, not odes, and as designed for public worship, should be marked by perspicuity, simplicity, and ease.'

Newton intimates, moreover, that Watts may have been under the necessity of restraining his muse while engaged in composing his Psalms and Hymns, in order to her being kept within a due degree of sobriety. This, to those who are conversant with his effusions, will not seem at all improbable, especially will it not to those who have read his 'Lyrics,' in which he uses a familiarity of address toward Jehovah and Jesus Christ, which would be more in keeping with the rhapsodies of a smitten swain, in addressing his mistress.

'I'd carve my passion on the bark,
And every wounded tree
Should droop, and bear some mystic mark
That Jesus died for me.'

My memory retains many such passages from the same work, although more than twenty years have elapsed since I read it. Charles Wesley, certainly much inferior to Watts as a poet, (despite the partial judgments of some Methodist critics to the contrary) Charles Wesley, I say, would probably have run into similar excesses of license, but for the censorship exercised over him by his more sober-minded brother, John, whose well disciplined judgment would not consent to tolerate such extravagancies. John would not even allow the epithet, dear, to be employed in connection with Christ. Charles, however, indemnified himself for this abridgment of the poet's license, by an excessive indulgence in hyperboles, paradoxes, and the like, with which many of his pieces abound.

'My earth thou waterest from on high,
But, make it all a pool!
Spring up, O well, I ever cry,
Spring up within my soul.'

To convert the soul into a pool of water, is certainly a strong figure! See, too, how paradoxical are the following passages.

'And sink me to perfection's height—
The depth of humble love.'

'And always sorrowful we live,
Rejoicing evermore.'

These kinds of extravaganza are of very frequent occurrence in the Methodist hymn-book. There prevailed, however, about that time, and some while previous, a passion for such things among the English poets. Young is full of them, both in his 'Night Thoughts,' and other poems.

————— 'he wept—the falling drop
Put out the sun.'

John Newton's opinion, as to the kind of talent requisite for the successful writing of hymns, finds a confirmation in that same 'Olney Collection' aforementioned; it was the joint production of himself and the poet Cowper. Newton contributed much the larger part of the work, and, to my thinking, much the better part also. Why? Because he was the better part of the two? No; by no means—he is not even reckoned among poets at all. No; the true reason is, it does not require a poet to write hymns. The thing can be done by a Dutch commentator, that literary pack-horse, who will write a whole folio on the meaning of a Greek particle. The chief requisites are a good ear for rhythm, a good command of words, and a power to appreciate religious sentiment, at least, if it be not actually experienced.

I am not to be understood as assuming that genuine poets can in no case write good hymns. Moore, Cowper, and Montgomery, are instances in proof to the contrary, saying nothing of Watts' and the Wesleys. Still Addison, who was but little better than a mediocre poet, and Newton, who, as aforesaid, was scarcely a poet at all, have produced hymns equal to any that have ever appeared in our language. Very excellent hymns, moreover, have been produced by Doddridge, Beddome, Toplady, and others not known or recognized as poets. Hence I infer, that to succeed in that sort of compositions, it is not essential that one should be a genuine poet.

We have not, so far as I know, a single poet in the male branch of our denomination—among the sisterhood we have several, of whom, for denominational reasons, I feel proud. A few of these are, in my judgment, eminently good; and one there is, whom, did we consent to exchange with Mrs. Sigourney, I for one, would be loath to give much to boot. This may say little for the credit of my taste in some people's opinion, but it is my sincere and deliberate judgment, nevertheless. Albeit, I wish that the inner world of the heart would oftener engage her muse, than the outer one of stars, and shells, and flowers.

'Not a single poet,' I have said, 'in the male branch of our denomination,' yet there are some few who approximate to that character, and many, doubtless, who could write good hymns. The Streeters have written a few that are excellent. Watts, himself, would not have been ashamed of the authorship of the hymn commencing, 'What glorious tidings do I hear.' Br. Thomas has produced quite a number of pieces, all of them passably good, and some of them eminently so. Good hymns have also been written by Brs. L. C. Browne, J. C. Waldo, and H. Ballou 2d; from the latter, the piece commencing, 'Praise ye the Lord, around whose throne,' is truly excellent.

Hymns may find a large degree of favor with the public, and yet in point of poetry—yea, and sentiment too, be the merest doggerel. An effusion of my own, entitled, 'The Abrahamic Covenant,' is decidedly the most popular thing I ever wrote in verse, and yet I humbly hope that, since I have come to years of discretion, I never have penned another so hobbling a specimen of versification. Nevertheless, were I to affirm that five hundred persons at different times and places, and of different religious sentiments, have requested a copy of it, I should be quite within the truth.

It is doubtful if there ever existed a body of hymns which so perfectly represented the peculiar sentiments of a people, as those of the Methodists do theirs. Every doctrine of Methodism—every feature of it, experimental and practical—every extravagance even, may be found so perfectly embodied in its hymns, that one is apt to be in doubt whether the hymns have moulded the character of the people, or the people transfused themselves into their hymns. They are characterised by a sort of cabalistic, or semi-transcendental mystecism, which broadly distinguishes them from the devotional effusions of every other people. They are a collection sui generis. I suspect, however, that this peculiar feature is of German origin—it certainly smacks of that school, and it is known that the Wesleys did actually learn the more mysterious points in their theology from the Moravians of Germany. There may, by possibility, be very good sense in such passages from the Methodist book as the following, but if so, I own my perceptions to be not sufficiently nice to discern it.

‘ Fondly my foolish heart essays
To augment the source of perfect bliss,
Love’s all-sufficient sea to raise
With drops of creature happiness.’

Does this mean that the author’s heart attempted to increase the bliss of the Supreme Being, by drops from its own felicity? Or what does it mean? The following, also, can only be intelligible to the initiated.

‘ Who hath slighted or contemn’d
The day of feeble things?
I shall be by grace redeem’d,
’Tis grace salvation brings.
Ready now my Savior stands,
Him I now rejoice to see,
With the plummet in his hands,
To build and finish me.’

See again the following, which, though more intelligible, is immeasurably extravagant and presumptuous.

‘ I cannot see thy face and live,
Then let me see thy face and die.
Now, Lord, my gasping soul receive,
Give me on eagle’s wings to fly.
With eagle’s eyes on thee to gaze,
And plunge into the glorious blaze.’

In pronouncing Charles Wesley inferior to Watts as a poet, I, nevertheless, am far from entertaining a low opinion of him. There are several grades, I conceive, between Watts and a mediocre poet, between him and Wesley there may be but one. Some difference in his favor there most decidedly is. The Methodists are fond of quoting a judgement pronounced by Watts himself on this point, in which he is represented as having said, that a hymn by Charles, entitled ‘Wrestling Jacob,’ was worth all that he himself had ever written. The divine bard may, in the excess of his modesty, have rendered such a judgement, but it will not be ratified, methinks, by any impartial critic. And, for my own part, I do not think that the particular effusion which is said to have called forth this eulogium, is equal to others from the same source—it is certainly inferior to that sweet hymn, commencing, ‘The morning flowers display their sweets,’ which, perhaps, is equal in poetic merit to anything from Watts’ pen.

Is it not desirable that we, also, should have a body of hymns that shall truly represent our views and feelings? I would not have it broadly doctrinal, and, yet, doctrinal it ought, in part, to be, in the less offensive sense of that word. It, at least, should not be allowed to supply our lips with sentiments which have no place in our faith. On this ground we have hitherto been too little particular, and for the reason, perhaps, that we have been borrowers, from orthodox sources, for nearly all the hymns we have used.

With the collection I have just published (comprising 668 pieces) I have taken unbounded pains, yet I am so far from thinking I have attained the ne plus ultra of excellence, that I am meditating an improved edition some ten years hence, and shall be composing and selecting with reference thereto during the whole interim. And when I have done all that my ability shall enable me to do, I shall still hold myself in readiness to surrender my individual title to the same, in favor of the denomination, whenever an earnest movement may be made to get up a denominational hymn-book.

I will close this long and rambling communication with a spiritual song I composed for my new book, but which I excluded as space grew scarce, to make room for a better one from another pen. This is in the metre of the song from Watts’ Lyrics, commencing, ‘I’m tired of visits, modes, and forms.’

Great God! who can thy love explore?
Who to its utmost heights can soar?
Or to its depths descend?
All creatures in the breadth of space
Are circled in its sweet embrace.
No increase nor decrease it knows,
Nor shall its ages end.

Who once this wondrous love has felt,
In raptures sweet is apt to melt
At thy delightful name.
No music so can charm the soul,
The passions feel its sweet control,
I could for such a heaven as this
All meaner joys disclaim.

In sacred converse, Lord, with thee,
How pure shall my communion be!
How blest beyond compare!
Then wheresoe'er my feet shall stray,
Thy love shall gild my darksome way,
On mountains—oceans—deserts wide,
'Twill find, and soothe me there.

Should lightnings blaze the world around,
And thunders shake the solid ground,
They'll not my trust remove;
My inmost soul shall hear thy voice,
And in those dreadful sounds rejoice.
What can I fear while God is nigh,
And God to me is LOVE?

Where'er I turn my raptur'd eyes,
Fresh proofs shall all around me rise,
That love is with me still;
All things beneath, and all above,
Shall to my soul discourse of love,
With ever, new and sweet delight
That voice my heart shall fill.

Oh, blest estate! such bliss to share,
Is all my struggling soul can bear
While pent in walls of clay.
But soon, my God, from flesh set free,
'Twill find its all of heaven in thee,
And love, and praise thee, and adore,
To everlasting day.

PROPHECY.

BY MRS. E. A. BACON.

HERE upon the threshold now,
Pilgrims all we stand;
Would we turn the veil aside
As with magic wand?
May we not be prophets all?
Look behind and see
All the faded year has been—
Read what this may be.

List! how reads that merry boy
As he presses by,
Dreaming of life's summer hours,
Bird and butterfly?
Nothing but of golden days
Passed in song and glee,
Joys he never won before,—
Ah, no prophet he.

Can it be that manly form,
With an eye so wild,
Heedeth less life's written page,
Than the careless child?
'O thou past, thou bitter past!
Now thy memories die;
Pleasure, in the coming year!
On to thee I fly.'

There moves one in sable robes,
Bowed with grief and woe,
Living in remembered joy
Perished long ago;
'Say ye not the veil is closed,—
All too well I see
Through its many riven folds,
Gloom and misery!'

Must we all so guideless pass?
List! who passes now?
Joy is in that kindly eye,
Peace enwreathes that brow.
All along his trodden path,
Blessed memories lie,
Over all his future, beams
A rainbow in the sky.

Pilgrims! do you hear his voice?
'Erring brother! stay!
Children! press not careless on,
I will lead the way.
Mourner! raise the swollen eye,
Doubter! bend the knee,—
See yon ray of heavenly light!
Now the mist shall flee.'

'Leave ye at the portals now,
Sorrow, sin and wo;
Trusting in that light divine,
On to virtue go.
Read within the book of life,
How the veil is riven.'—
Christian Prophet! thou canst see
Thro' vistas into heaven.

ONE DAY IN THE LIFE OF A KING.

BY IONE.

It was morning in Judea—a bright, rich, glorious morning; and king David, mounting his fiery war-horse splendidly caparisoned and glittering with jewels, whose smooth skin rivalled in whiteness the snows of Lebanon, and whose colorless mane and tail waving in luxuriance swept the ground, rode from his palace gates, followed by a long and brilliant retinue. Upon an open plain without the city's walls, were stationed the flower of his army awaiting the presence of their monarch and general. Every head was uncovered and reverentially bowed to the earth as he approached, and, for a moment, absorbed in the splendor of the scene, he forgot that sorrow and remorse had entered his heart despite breast-plate and armor, his soldiers and his crown.

'Twas noon—and in the audience chamber of his palace king David sat upon his throne of ivory and gold. Around him were gathered the ablest statesmen of their time, and his proud generals restive in peace and waiting only for the battle cry to rush to carnage and victory. Ambassadors from other kingdoms and other climes had sought the royal presence.

One, wearing the device of Egypt's great ruler and bearing himself proudly in remembrance of the years when the Israelites, now so powerful and wealthy, were the bondmen of his fathers, with numerous representatives of the lesser monarchies, had assembled in that splendid apartment to do honor to the renowned and warlike David. The eye of the king glanced over that proud pageant and again pride and vanity had possession of his heart; but there came the remembrance of the insufficiency of earthly power, wealth, and grandeur, and he descended from his throne and laid his sceptre down, wishing that he were once more the harmless, happy shepherd boy upon the fresh green hills that limited his aching vision.

It was early evening in Judea, and the heavens were still clothed in a rich robe of amber and crimson. A few of the most brilliant stars lent their mild rays to render the scene more lovely, and ere the sunset hues had quite faded from the horizon, the bright, full moon shot up from the East and added her crowning glory to the unequalled splendor of the heavens. In the royal palace of Judea were spread the banquet tables and the eye could scarcely rest upon their glittering burden. Gold and silver vessels of cunning workmanship and studded with jewels most rare and costly, any one of which would have made the wealth of moderate desire, were scattered with a profusion that betrayed to the eyes of foreign emissaries the unbounded wealth and resources of their kingly host.

The princely nobles of the land, profusely ornamented with precious stones and clad in costly raiment, but unaccompanied by their dark eyed and beautiful country-women, assembled round that magnificent repast in answer to the summons of their king, and were greeted with strains of thrilling melody from the royal band. The brilliant flowers of that tropical clime filled the arched chambers with their delicate fragrance and spoke, but alas! to closed ears, of the great Artizan who cut and painted each exquisite leaf and, that nothing might be wanting to the perfection of his work, clothed it with odor such as delights and charms the senses. But the music, the feast, the song, the dance, were ended, and David entered his chamber, and taking the diadem from his lofty and careworn brow laid it upon an embroidered cushion and turned in silence to the window. He parted the rich drapery and looked out upon the glorious spectacle of a world at rest; while through the exquisitely transparent atmosphere the uncounted fires of heaven could be seen with a distinctness and brilliancy that mocks description. His eye glanced over the beautiful arch and recognising the Maker amid his works, he repeated with touching earnestness, What is man that thou art mindful of him? Without, all was still save the soft melodies that ever float upon the evening air and the tread of his armed men as they kept guard around his palace walls.

The scenes of the day passed in rapid review before him, and he knew that among the multitude who had bowed to his sceptre there was not one to supply the place of the lamented and true-hearted Jonathan. Then came the recollection of other and happier days, before he had lain his innocence upon the altar of ungoverned passion and ambition, when the calm eye of his adopted brother rested in sweet approval upon his face, and he felt most keenly the consciousness of being all unworthy the devotion of that noble heart. He remembered with unutterable anguish the hour when that beloved and trusted one fell upon the battle field and he softly murmured now what before he had uttered in the first tempest of passionate grief—Very precious wert thou unto me for thy love surpassed that of women. The king of far-famed Israel, the immortal minstrel of the Holy Land, exclaiming no man careth for my soul, laid his head upon his pillow and bedewed it with his tears.

Great ruler of God's chosen people, could thy unobstructed vision have traveled down time's broad stream and read through coming centuries the history of thine extended and brave nation, how would thy spirit have been wounded with the arrow of despair! When thou wert robed in kingly power, Rome, the scourge and destroyer of thy nation, claimed no name in history. Thou didst never dream of the coming mistress of the world, whose haughty emperors should snatch the crown from thy successors, and command their victorious eagle to soar triumphant over the city of David, the centre of thy possessions and power, the holy city of the minstrel king of Judea! Behold, how the twelve tribes are scattered over the habitable earth, without high-priest, king, or country,—separated beyond the hope of re-union, and with only the memory of their glorious ancestors to sustain them under scorn, injury and insult.

But rest thee, unhappy monarch, while thy land is trodden by the sneering infidel and regarded only by Jew and Christian as hallowed ground. Rest thee, for the memory of thy warlike achievements and lofty inspiration can no more be extinguished than the sun in the far-off heavens. Rest thee, for, we believe thy deeds of darkness were blotted out by the gushing tears of repentance, and the soul that could pour forth such lamentations is one that could not long submit to the iron rule of vice. Rest thee, for from the root of Jesse there has sprung one before whose name thine own is as a feeble star beside the resplendent mid-day sun. Rest thee, for thy words are more precious than household memories, and have assisted in guiding many a trembling sinner to the throne of God.

SUNSHINE and cloud! fit emblems of man's life. PR.

THE SNOW STORM.

THE sun rose dimly in the morning. The fields were obscured by the mist that wreathed above them, as a light breeze passed over plain and hillock. A gigantic tree could be discerned, darkly looming in the fog, and the outlines of the great rock, like a huge hunter clad in furs. The weather was soft, and the husbandman moved about among his flocks and herds, contributing to their welfare, and endeavoring to make sure that none had strayed away. Towards noon, the air became more clear and cold: the winds drove away the mist; but heavy clouds obscured the sun, and the cheerless day was dark and uncomfortable. The cottager piled the wood upon the hearth, and drew near to enjoy its reviving warmth.

Small globules of snow could now be discerned gradually peppering the ground and rolling from the eaves of the sheds and out-houses, while the cattle huddled together as if sensible that a storm was approaching. The wind now came in gusts, and the snow fell faster, the small globules changing to broad flakes. These lodged on the roofs and on the branches of trees, whitening the upper surfaces while it was dark beneath, like the shading of pictures. By four o'clock in the afternoon, the landscape had become thoroughly whitened. The snow was deep upon the plain; while in many a huge drift, it was thrown up like breastworks to check the progress of an invading enemy. Now and then, the wind swept away the top of one of these drifts, and carried a cloud of snow onward for miles, so as to blind any passenger who had ventured abroad during the storm. The afternoon grew darker and darker, and the winds moaned, roared and shrieked above the old roof of George Masters, as he sat by the fireside quietly smoking his long pipe. His wife was engaged in kneading some dough, for the purpose of having her warm biscuits ready when little William and Nancy should return from school.

'The mistress will send somebody home with the children,' said Mrs. Masters, 'and she will see that they are wrapped up well, for they have more than a mile to walk, and the wind is right in their faces.'

'They will not walk, I think,' said her husband, 'for Zeb Walker's house is near by, and he has only to put his horse to his sleigh, and bring them home in a few minutes. The mistress will see that they don't walk.'

'Perhaps so,' returned Mrs. Masters, 'and very kind of Ned it is to—'

'Stop, my dear,' said the other, 'I thought I heard somebody at the door.' They listened awhile, and then decided that it was nothing but the wind. Soon, however, a distinct rap was heard, and Mrs. M. hastened to the door in the belief that the children had arrived. On opening the door, she shrunk back in disappointment, for a man clad in unusual apparel, of a rough exterior, and evidently belonging to the poorer class of society, stood before her. His hat appeared to have been covered with cloth and painted black, while his other apparel was of a faded blue, and had been patched in several places.

'I beg your pardon, ma'am,' said he, 'but I have called to see if you could give some refreshment and a shelter for the night, to a poor sailor. I have been shipwrecked, and have lost my all, and am travelling into the interior towards the home of my childhood.'

Mrs. Masters looked at him with surprise, and then replied in a brief manner that she would call her husband. She went into the apartment which she had just left, and told her husband that an old straggler was at the door, and she wished he would go out and drive him away.

Mr. Masters went slowly to the door, with his pipe in his mouth, and asked the stranger what he wished for?

'Food and a lodging is all I wish for,' said he. 'I have suffered from the cold and the snow, and from hunger, and want rest and refreshment.'

'Every man ought to be housed, I should think,' said the other, looking out upon the drifting snow; 'but have you inquired no where else?'

'At a large white house about two miles below here—'

'Squire W.'s house?' interrupted the other, 'you could not get in there, of course; but I don't know as we could conveniently accommodate you; besides there is a good tavern about three miles farther on.'

'But I have not a cent of money,' replied the sailor.

'Yes—well—that's bad,' returned Mr. M., 'but you ought to have taken care of your money when you did have it. Are you a drinking man?'

'I have been wrecked,' said the seaman, 'and had no money to lay out for liquor. But I only desire to know whether you can give me a crust of bread and lodgings for the night.'

'Well, I guess you had better go farther on,' said the other, and immediately closed the door.

Mr. M. returned to the room, and after mentioning that the man was gone, remarked that the sleighing would be perilous to man and beast; and said that he believed he must go after the children.

Mrs. M. looked out at the window, and then said, with alarm in her countenance, 'I believe it is hardly safe for you to venture; and it cannot be possible that the mistress would permit the children to come home alone, on such an awful evening as this.'

So her husband again sat down in the corner, while his wife proceeded to set the table, and turn the cakes. Time passed on, and the table had been kept standing some time, while no children appeared. They sat down and ate in silence, starting at every noise which they heard, and wondering that their children had not arrived. The storm fearfully increased. The windows shook violently, and the door was, several times, burst open by the gale, when the snow was blown into the entry, and carried even into the room where they sat. 'Where are my children?' cried the frantic mother—at length giving utterance to her anguish.

Mr. Masters partook of her alarm, and hastily put on his coat, and seized his staff.

'No—I cannot have you go out now,' said his wife. They cannot have been sent home—and if they were sent home, of what use could you be? We will wait—perhaps they will come in the sleigh.'

Mr. Masters saw that his wife's reasoning was just. Still he continued to walk the room with his great coat on, and occasionally looked out at the window in the direction of the school-house. Candles were now lighted, and the evening set in, very dark.

'They must be safe at the house of the school mistress,' said Mrs. M., and so they endeavored to console themselves with this reflection.

In the morning, Mr. M. arose very early, and directed his course toward the school-house. He soon arrived there, although the snow was deep. Yet the wind was hushed, and the weather was not very cold. On arriving at the house of the school mistress, Mr. M. raised the latch with a trembling hand. He found the girl astir. She had risen earlier than common. He anxiously inquired if his children were in the house?

'No,' replied she, 'mistress sent them home earlier than common on account of the snow, and the darkness; I helped fasten on their cloaks myself—but, pray tell me, Mr. Masters, have not William and Nancy got home?'

The cry of surprise and terror which she gave when Mr. M. answered in the negative, awaked the school mistress who slept in the adjoining room, and she owned that the children had set out for home on foot and alone, on the preceding evening.

Mr. Masters clasped his hands and groaned aloud. He rushed out of the doors, and retraced his steps, searching every thicket and examining every snow heap with the fear of finding the frozen bodies of his little ones. He saw them not, and when he reached home without the children, his wife stayed not to ask him any question, but fell into violent hysterics. This scene lasted about an hour, when the door suddenly opened, and 'Zeb Walker' entered to tell the distressed parents that their children were safe. 'They were met on the road, just ready to drop down,' said this messenger of glad tidings, 'by a poor man, who had no home for himself. He took them up in his arms, and carried them into the old hovel which stands on the bounds of George West's farm. There happened to be a plenty of hay there, and he rubbed them and made them warm, and then he covered them up well with hay, and lay down and slept beside them, so that now they are as fresh and lively as two red roses. They are on the road, and will be here in a minute.'

Mr. M. flew out of the door to meet his rescued little ones, but they were already in the door yard led by their preserver. The parents were so glad to greet their little William and Nancy, that they did not, at first, notice their preserver; but when they raised their eyes to look upon him, with hearts full of gratitude, they met the gaze of the poor wandering sailor whom they had turned from their door. They acknowledged that their parental anguish had been a just punishment for their inhospitality.

TO ———,

ON RECEIVING FROM HIM 'FRIENDSHIP'S OFFERING.'

BY IONE.

THANKS for thy beautiful gift!

It startles the soul with its magic name,
And kindles anew to a brilliant flame
The taper of memory waning fast,
Ere the heart grows old, or its joys are past!
Long will I treasure with careful thrift,
Generous donor! Thy beautiful gift!

Misers may boast of their gold!

It was won perchance from the orphan child,
Or plucked from a wreck 'mid the tempest wild,
Or the price of blood it may once have been
And stained like its owner's heart with sin!
Must I his heart in his wealth enfold,
It should not be thine for a price untold!

What shall my offering be?

A wish that the laurel may crown thy brow?
Thou wouldst be less happy and free than now!
Shall I ask for thee friends? A noble band
Are ready to offer the friendly hand!
What shall my 'friendship's offering' be?
A simple prayer and a wish for thee!

May thy spirit's realm be bright,

And sin from its portal turn away,
With a broken shield and a baffled sway!
As the sunset hues with the azure blend,
So calmly may life and its pleasures end!
Not lost in the ebon veil of night
But wearing an angel crown of light.

SELECTIONS.

WILLIAM HOWITT—A PASSAGE IN HUMAN LIFE.

IN my daily walks into the country, I was accustomed to pass a certain cottage. It was no cottage ornée;—it was no cottage of romance. It had nothing particularly picturesque about it. It had its little garden, and its vine spreading over its front; but beyond these, it possessed no feature likely to fix it in the mind of a poet, or a novel writer, and which might induce him to people it with beings of his own fancy. In fact, it appeared to be inhabited by persons as little extraordinary as itself. A good-man of the house it might possess, but he was never visible. The only inmates I ever saw, were a young woman, and another female in the wane of life, no doubt the mother.

The damsel was a comely, fresh, mild-looking cottage girl enough; always seated in one spot, near the window, intent on her needle. The old dame was as regularly busied, to and fro, in household affairs. She appeared one of those good housewives, who never dream of rest, except in sleep. The cottage stood so near the road, that the fire at the farther end of the room showed you, without being rudely inquisitive, the whole interior, in the single moment of passing. A clean hearth, and a cheerful fire, shining upon homely but neat and orderly furniture, spoke of comfort; but whether the dame enjoyed, or merely diffused, that comfort, was a problem.

I passed the house many successive days. It was always alike,—the fire shining brightly and peacefully;—the girl seated at her post, by the window;—the housewife going to and fro, catering and contriving, dusting and managing. One morning, as I went by, there was a change; the dame was seated near her daughter, her arms laid upon the table, and her head reclined upon her arms. I was sure that it was sickness which had compelled her to that attitude of repose; nothing less could have done it. I felt that I knew exactly the poor woman's feelings. She had felt a weariness stealing upon her;—she had wondered at it, and struggled against it, and borne up, hoping it would pass by; till, loth as she was to yield, it had forced submission.

The next day, when I passed, the room appeared as usual; the fire burning pleasantly,—the girl at her needle, but her mother was not to be seen; and glancing my eye upwards, I perceived the blind close drawn in the window above. It is so, I said to myself; disease is in its progress. Perhaps it occasions no gloomy fear of consequences, no extreme concern; and yet who knows how it may end? It is thus that begin those changes that draw out the central bolt which holds together families; which steal away our fire-side faces, and lay waste our affections.

I passed by, day after day. The scene was the same. The fire burning;—the hearth beaming clean and cheerful; but the mother was not to be seen;—the blind was still drawn above. At length I missed the girl; and in her place appeared another woman, bearing considerable resemblance to the mother, but of a quieter habit. It was easy to interpret this change. Disease had assumed an alarming aspect;—the daughter was occupied in intense watching, and caring for the suffering mother; and the good woman's sister had been summoned to her bedside, perhaps from a distant spot, and perhaps from her family cares, which no less important an event could have induced her to elude.

Thus appearances continued some days. There was a silence around the house, and an air of neglect within it;—till, one morning, I beheld the blind drawn in the room below, and the window thrown open above. The scene was over;—the mother was removed from her family; and one of those great changes effected in human life, which commence with so little observation, but leave behind them such lasting effects.

THE TEACHINGS OF THE DEAD.

'I feel that the dead have conferred a blessing on me, by helping me to think rightly of the world.'

REV. ORVILLE DEWEY.

CALL'ST thou the dead our teachers?

Must we come
And sit among the clods, and lay our ear
To the damp crannies of the loathsome tomb,
And listen for their love? There breathes no sound
From all those stern and stone-bound sepulchres,
Save that through rustling grass the low winds sweep,
And stir the branches of yon dark-browed pines,
In sullen undulation.

Yet, thou say'st

The dead are teachers.

Would they stretch their hands,
And on our tablets write one pencil-trace,
How would we hoard it in our hearts?
All motionless! All passionless! All mute!
Oh, Silence! twin with Wisdom! I would press
My lip upon yon cradled infant's grave,
And drink the murmur of its smitten bloom.
A mother's young pride in her beautiful,
Laid low!—laid low! How slow the aspen-stem
Round which her heart's joys twined! Ours, too, are frail.
Like hers. The flow'ret in the reaper's path
Hath as good hopes to greet the golden morn.
Read I thy lesson right, my little one?
Lo! by thy side the strong man sleepeth well—
The tall, proud man, who towered like Israel's king,
With head above the people. Yet, his wail,
Was it not weak, as thine, when Death launched home
The fatal arrow? 'Dust to dust!' should be
The mournful watch-word of the born of earth;
And the deep teaching of such lonely creed
Best cometh from the dead.

Ah! let me kneel
Here, on this mound, where sleeps my early friend,
And wait her words in lowliness of soul.
Speak'st thou not to me?—thou, whose loving voice
Gav'st the sweet key-tone to our fond discourse,
When, lost in lonely haunts, we wandered long,
Shunning the crowd?

Dear as thou wert to me
In that cementing time, when school-day sports
Make lasting sisterhood, even now, it seems
I loved thee not enough. Say, was it so,
My lost companion? Were there tender words
I might have said to thee, yet said them not?
Where there not higher flights of glorious thought,
And nobler trophies on Life's rugged steep,
To which I might have urged thee?

Blind! and weak!
I thought to have thee ever by my side;
And so the hours swept by, till thou didst spread
A hidden wing, and prove thine angel-birth.
Oh! teach me with a firmer grasp to seize
The passing day, nor with omitted deeds,
Nor the defrauded sympathies of love,
Load the uncertain future. So thy tomb
Shall be my bless'd instructor, and I'll go
Sadder, yet wiser, to my work again,
Amid the changeful ministers of life. Mrs. Sigourney.

THE GREAT PRINCIPLE.

BY HENRY BACON.

It is a Scripture truth, very frequently repeated, that Jesus by the grace of God tasted death for every man, and yet how many utterly disbelieve it. The foundation principle of partialism is that God had vengeance towards man, which vengeance or wrath Christ died to turn away; and on this error, system on system has been built up to the hurt of man and the veiling of God's glory. But let us suppose for a moment that the reading of the Record were according to popular views of Christianity—how different would be our thoughts, emotions and feelings, did we read that Jesus, because of the wrath of God, tasted death for every man! Then we should look on him as a sacrifice to appease a revengeful Divinity, to turn aside shafts of vengeance that were winging their way from the throne to human hearts, and we should have no inclination to take our eyes from Jesus and lift them to heaven, for we could hope to greet nothing lovelier there. And yet if the common views of the death of Christ were true, the record should read thus, for as it now reads it presents altogether a different idea. As plain as words can express a truth, it is written that the glory that rested on Jesus and by which he was strengthened to taste death for every man, was from the grace of God. Heb. ii. 9. By the grace of God he died for man—grace ordained the death, grace blessed the dying hour and made it full of moral glory. Grace produced all the issues thereof. Grace rolled the stone from the mouth of the sepulchre, burst the bands of death, parted the mysterious veil that shrouds heaven from mortal eyes, and placed the risen Savior on the throne of Mediation. Infinite are the operations of the same grace to secure the end for which Jesus died, and in the fullness of times its complete spiritual conquest will wake the shout of adoring millions and the loftiest hymns of angels and seraphim.

This grand idea gives a peculiar glory to the whole mission of Christ which nothing else can possibly give. The 'bright result' 'changes the hues of all intermediate scenes;' and one motive is given to awaken love, to prompt to duty, to bless the hand which gives and takes, and to console in trial, bereavement, and death—and that is the grace of God! It is the most powerful of all attracting influences, for it binds the heavenly hosts to perfection, and makes obedience their very life. In its almightiness is our trust for a complete redemption—for the incoming of the age when the smile of God shall be mirrored in every human face, as the pure dew drop mirrors the sunbeam.

I designed but a mere allusion to this great idea, as I wish to attract attention to another grand truth—that Jesus tasted death for every man. I wish it to come with its mighty emphasis to every soul—I wish its broad and deep meaning to be understood—I wish every one to realize his individual interest in it, that every one, by the force of its indwelling energy, may give unto God the glory that is due, and rejoice that he has not given unto us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind. I wish to show how truly it sympathizes with the most enlarged philanthropy—how it breathes new life into every project for the amelioration of our race, and how it shows forth the importance of man as man—the worth of the individual soul. If in this I can succeed, justly and truly—without sophistry or evasion, I shall prove that the spirit of Christ—the spirit of the Gospel, is the very genius of Progress, and that we can hope for man and rejoice in promises of good, according as we discern the spirit of the great idea concerning Christ's death, giving form or character to social institutions.

Many such institutions there are, and almost invariably—if not without exception—when they are considered and descanted upon as giving character to the age—as forming an epoch in history, they are described as embracing one great idea, that man as man is important and his virtue the highest consideration—that he must not be abandoned. Every change in these institutions develops more of this characteristic, and new associations are continually springing up in advance of the old. All these—bearing on their front respect for man as man—for every man, are really the product of the age—were started into existence by the new pulses opened in the social heart by the progress of liberality. They could not have been called into being the last century. The seeds of these stately, towering, and sheltering trees, were then just beginning to germinate. The soil was too cold to permit them to spring up speedily; slowly and tenderly they sent out the delicate fibres, secretly and gently preparing for a mighty future growth. The tree has now sprung up—how majestic and yet beautiful it is! Pleasant to the eye and sweet to the taste is its fruit—no harm lurks in the partaking thereof, and its very leaves are for the healing of the nations. Every plant and every tree which our heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up, that the sustenance given to them may all be bestowed on this one glorious tree, under which all shall at last gather, with none to molest or make them afraid.

The spirit of the age is emphatically the spirit of our faith. In past centuries when philanthropy slumbered and man was deemed the tool of kings, the few voices that plead for worthier ideas of human nature, came from hearts in which the spirit of our faith abode—good and true souls who had learned to individualize man, and see in the prostrate subject a brother of the exalted sovereign on the throne. It has asked and asked for faith in universal improvability, that experiments might be tried in comparison with the severe and austere measures of power in the past. It has continued to repeat the unchanging truth, till ears heard and hearts believed. It led—while itself was unknown—to the prison and the dungeons of the insane, and made the heart abhor the inhumanity of caging men worse than cattle were sheltered. Soon a change was wrought, and the criminal assumed less the aspect of a wild beast, for there was less to aid the imagination in regarding him as such. Then men began to be willing to inscribe on the portals of the prison what Howard found inscribed upon the walls of a noble edifice in Rome—‘It is of little advantage to restrain the bad by punishment, unless you render them good by discipline.’ This same spirit has entered into legislation and modified the criminal laws, so that more and more reference is being made to the man, instead of the criminal—to the good of each, rather than the condemnation of classes. And the same spirit is, as it has been, impelling on to nobler and wider schemes to spread around the means of obtaining useful knowledge and the education of the common mind. With great power has it made itself manifest in the new and grand movement in the cause of Temperance, whereby the good of faith in individual man has been gloriously shown forth, and noble examples of fidelity to the principle that no man should be abandoned, have been given. This movement is a sublime testimony of the advancement of the liberal spirit, and that man as man is valued. It shows what is the difference between loving man and the sinner; how the love of man will prompt to effort to redeem him from that character, and cause the soul to yearn over him as over a brother in peril. God speed such laborers, for every act of theirs does something to make clearer and clearer the grand truth of our faith, that God and Christ are the eternal foes of sin, but yet the friends, and the unfailing friends, of the victim of sin. Such laborers are doing a great work that shall tell mightily ere another generation for the spread of our faith, and cause thousands to own the deep meaning of the record—that Jesus, by the grace of God, tasted death for every man.

In the hour when Jesus died, the first clear and glorious manifestation of a world-embracing love, was made. Beyond that time, through long ages, no such beautiful and bright revelation can be found. The light had indeed burned in some hearts, and in the hours when its divine warmth was felt, glorious prophecies were breathed and heavenly visions passed before them; but they were oft like the poet called back to dull scenes from rapt communings with the grand and the beautiful. The spirit of Christ ‘was in them,’ and they prophesied of the grace that should come, while they themselves, as Peter tells us, inquired and searched diligently to understand what, or what manner of time, the spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow. The effects of this we can easily imagine, if in our souls is benevolence kindred with that of the Master; it gave them visions of exceeding loveliness—so bright and glorious that they could scarcely realize even at times that they were true types of what should be. But, thank God, we are differently situated. We are not required to look forward to the coming of the Messiah, for his sufferings are past, and the glory has been, and is being revealed, that was to follow. We can look back to the age in which Jesus lived on earth, and feel that he came from God as we discern the vast and divine difference between his character and that which would have been the product of the age. Far, far in advance of the happiest and best tendencies of that era was his character, and the progress of eighteen centuries has not prepared man fully to appreciate its excellences—it is not yet applied as it should be to the interpretation of his religion, and still theories are advocated as christianity which are radically opposed to the spirit of Christ. Yet we can hope. The signs of the times are full of promise. Every thing is tending to expand noble feelings and generous sentiments, and preparing the common mind to appreciate Christ and honor him. Men dare not speak as once they spake of the masses; they dare not legislate as once they did, overlooking the great law of equity; and on every side the importance of the individual—of each man, is contended for.

The spirit of all this, is the spirit of Christ—the spirit of Universalism. It is only our faith that individualizes man and makes each of infinite worth—too precious in the sight of God to ever be abandoned, or be permitted eternally to desecrate the high powers of his intellectual and moral nature. Here is our position against the world of theologians. Here is where we hold fast, looking steadily at Calvary and repeating with devout thankfulness, as we gaze on the crucified Lord—'By the grace of God he tasted death for every man.' Not in vain did he give himself a ransom for all; for that which is of infinite value may well be worthy of the exercise of infinite wisdom and power to preserve it and to secure it from harm.

And O what clearer manifestations can possibly be asked for than have been given of the truth—that each soul is of infinite value to God! The whole christian world acknowledges the fact, and continually is it proclaimed. Men are urged and pleaded with to receive it, and to realize it, and to act it out in devotion to the loftiest purposes of human existence. But while all this is done, most singular declarations are also made, that come in like a miserable harsh discord amid sounds of heavenly harmony. These declarations are—that the infinitely valuable soul is in imminent danger of being lost to God and virtue and happiness, eternally! Such an idea as this clashes wildly with the other, and gives an aspect of mockery to all the manifestations of God's estimate of the soul as infinitely valuable! I mean this, in the fullest strength and emphasis of the language. And indeed, if the common idea of the imminent danger of the soul be regarded as correct, I see no possible way in which a revelation could or can be made of the infinite worth of man's spiritual nature, if such be really its value. No, no; till we perceive the clear truth that the Deity hath purposed the recovery of each, and hath ordained infinite means to secure the end purposed, we cannot realize as we are privileged to realize the infinite worth of the soul—the glory of our spiritual nature—the grandeur of the Redemption—the infinity of God. Till we perceive this, we cannot take home to our hearts the full and soul satisfying meaning of the record, that Jesus, by the grace of God, tasted death for every man.

The glory of that death was from the indwelling grace of God. Such is the apostolic assertion; and if so, it is absurdity to declaim that the wrath of God was that hour poured out in all its fullness on the head of Jesus, and that he suffered all the punishment due to the sins of millions on millions. Besides outraging every dictate of equity and justice, it is directly opposed to the record that the grace of God enabled Jesus to die as he did die. And the record in this one instance harmonizes with all other references to his death, especially with the unequivocal assertion that God commendeth his love to us, in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us—for every man. Thus through the self-sacrifice of Jesus, God spake of his own love for sinful man, his purpose to reconcile man to himself and cause all hearts to serve him.

This is what every man needs. He needs to feel it a reality that God loves him—that amid all the grandeur of the outward world, all is as nothing to the Deity compared with man. The outward world would be as nothing were it not for man's intellectual and moral nature, as its glory would exist as the stars exist to a blind eye. God loves man—yea, sinful man—because he endowed him with this nature, and knows the capacities for improvement which he possesses, and how they can be developed unto everlasting good. This is what man needs to feel—that God will never abandon him—that though man cast him out and there be no eye to weep for him and no heart to care for him, yet God pities him and will care for him. It is this that has melted icy hearts and opened fountains of tears long closed, as when the gentle wind has swept away the sere leaves from a forest spring and the bright sunshine has stolen in to bid the waters sparkle in bubbling beauty. It is this that will ever prove powerful to accomplish like works.

In every exhibition of human self-sacrifice—in every act of love towards the sinful, God reveals his grace and love for man—every man. He inspired those feelings—it is his grace by which they act. It is his grace that gives the energy of unconquerable love to the mother's heart and the martyr suffering wife. It is his grace that is pleading by man to man to never abandon his fellow—to cling to him—to serve him—to labor to redeem him. It is his grace that gives mighty eloquence to the advocate of human rights as he demands that every man be counted a man and honored as such in all laws and all government. It is his grace that is giving a glory to our age that will make it the herald of the golden era of universal and perpetual progress. As we behold the onward march of Right, Liberty, and Truth, let us bow down and adore, for God is there.

Jesus knew what was in man, and he died for every man. Make the picture of human sinfulness as dark as colors can make it, and let no sunlight fall upon it, and yet we say—Jesus tasted death for every man. He saw something worth tasting death for. He discerned the existence of an immortal improvable spirit in every man, and he bowed his head to the mandate of the Father. And O that we could see what he perceived, for then should we reverence mind every where, and estimate more highly the dignity of our own nature—then should we put forth more effort to improve after the christian pattern—then should we be less satisfied with the advances we have made, and forgetting the things which are behind, we should be reaching forth to those things which are before, pressing toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

And shall we not give diligent heed to realize our individual interest in the death of Christ and his living and immortal love? That for us he died and rose and ascended on high—that for us he lives and reigns and conquers—that for us all power is given unto him, and a name that is above every name? Shall we not so feel this as to live unto him who died for us and rose again? O beautiful is that passion in human nature that makes noble devotion to worthy aims, to spring from a consciousness of what has been wrought for us! Beautiful is the power of retrospection when it prompts the soul to repay the tributes of the past, by doing good in the present time and for the future. We all own the inestimable services of our toiling sires; we venerate the land they consecrated by noble deeds and heroic suffering; we bless past ages for the tributes poured into our own, and we love to contemplate the agents of progress. All this is well; but we are false to the noblest moral power and dead to the purest sanctity of the imagination, if we never visit Calvary, nor strive to feel how much is meant by the death of Jesus there. Come, come with me. Look up and reverently gaze! O that crown of thorns! O that bleeding side! O those pierced hands and nailed feet! For me—for thee, reader, he died. Will we not live for him? Let me answer with a tone that shall thrill every fibre of the soul—‘Yes, O yes!’

WINTER.

WELL, now, in good earnest the Winter is come,
His shrill clarion notes tingle my ears,
He was not expected so soon, though, by some,
And much frostier, too, he appears;
Eccentric old fellow! he comes by surprise,
To pinch our cold toes and throw tears in our eyes.

The mischievous chap has a terrible cold,
He is wheezing, his speaking is hoarse;
He always speaks loud, though, and roughly, I'm told,
As his voice is by nature quite coarse;
'Tis injured by singing in too high a key
Alike requiem grave and the liveliest glee.

In the northern frost caves, where his armory is,
He has taken his annual sleep,
And now in new strength, with a frown on his phiz,
Spreading ruin, around he will sweep;
His legions are clad in their polished ice mail,
They ravage, unheeding the suppliants' wail.

At the clanging of chains as they rush through the land
And shout fiercely with deafening blast,
Their captives are quaking, defenceless they stand,
They are taken, resistance is past.
Alas, rebel prowess! their courage is lost,
They're bound with a heart-chilling fetter of frost.

The rills, that danced joyously in their wild play,
With sweet melody filling the vale,
Leaped glittering forth as he came on his way,
Glad to bid the old surly one hail.
But this availed nought, their long struggles were vain;
Resistless and mute, now, they lie in his chain.

The flowerets that waited his coming lie dead,
His cold breath stretched them stiff on the ground;
The forest in majesty bowed its hoar head,
And with dignity nodded around.

But Winter with furious howling rushed through,
A chill on its stagnating life-fluid blew.

A sullen and stern-visaged monarch is he,
His own way he likes wilfully best;
His blustering pomp, though, gives pleasure to me,
His bleak reign is a season of rest.
His snow-flakes I love, and his crystalline storms,
And my fancy exults in his terrible forms.

Let him frown—what of that?—frowns soon pass away,
And are always succeeded by smiles;
Even Winter relaxes his muscles, their play
His dark face of its harshness beguiles.
And many soft glances for us he prepares,—
We value them more as they come unawares.

Luxurious Summer in indolent prime
May charm with its languishing ease;
But twilight round Capricorn melts, and the time
Well with vigorous action agrees;
I love this time best, it gives strength to my soul,
Its hours glide like meteor flames round the north pole.

I love thee, rude Winter—I'm glad thou art here,
Thy clean hearth is a bright, social one;
The jingling of sleigh-bells, the boys' skating cheer,
Real pleasure betoken, and fun.
Despising discretion and scorning advice,
Enjoyment skims over the snow and glare ice.

Old Winter! I love thee, and so does the sky,
With its choice, starry-brilliant re-set;
Its splendor glows not at the bland Summer's sigh,
But thy reign it can never forget,—
It is shedding its stellar magnificence down,
To kindle with glory thy icicle crown.

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF WOMAN'S LIFE. NO. VI.

BY CHARLOTTE.

LUCY'S LESSON.

‘A something light as air—a look—
A word unkind, or wrongly taken—
O love that tempests never shook,
A breath—a touch like this hath shaken.’

‘AND so, Harry, you are seriously angry with me.’
‘Nay, Lucy, not angry, but zealous for your happiness and welfare; and my anxiety may have made me seem over-earnest.’

‘Nonsense! you are jealous—foolishly jealous of William Dale;—you need not bend those haughty eyes so disdainfully upon me, Harry Stuart, for you know that what I say is true!’

‘And for once, let me tell you, Lucy, you are most egregiously mistaken. Jealousy is a passion whose scorpion-sting I never yet felt, and sure I am it will never be aroused by the impertinence or folly of such a thing as he whom you just named.’

'Fie! for shame, Harry! even in that insulting speech you have proved the truth of what I averred. What right have you to scandalize the good name of one whom you hardly know, and whose manners and whole appearance are those of a gentleman?'

'Pardon me, Miss Annesley, but I do know him far better than I wish—I do know that gay and graceful as he is, his fascinations have been put forth to win the confidence and affections of unsuspecting maidens like yourself, whom his villainy has afterwards doomed to a broken heart and an untimely grave—I know that the voice whose soft accents whisper honied words in your charmed ear, is oftener raised in bacchanalian songs at his midnight carousals, or in blaspheming the name of his Creator, when fortune had been against him at the gaming-table;—all this, Lucy, I know, and therefore do I warn you against him.'

'And let me tell you, sir, that your warnings are as unwelcome as they are unseasonable—as if there could be any harm in a little simple flirtation.'

'Can you, Lucy, speak so lightly of that from which the delicate feelings of any pure minded, high souled woman must naturally revolt? Can you call that harmless, which is daily deteriorating from the beauty and excellence of your character, and dimming the pure lustre of your mind and heart? Believe me, there is nothing which will so soon incur the contempt, and forfeit the esteem of any high-principled and honorable man, as to see the woman of his love engaged in so degrading and despicable an amusement as that which you call a simple flirtation. I may have spoken too warmly, Lucy—but I feel the subject deeply, and surely dearest, you will forgive any seeming harshness in one, who has been your tried and true friend from childhood, whose love you have accepted and reciprocated, and who looks upon you as the beloved companion of his future life.'

'From this moment then let the connection be dissolved; I abjure the tie and renounce your boasted love; and henceforth let Harry Stuart and Lucy Annesley be as strangers to each other—Farewell!'

'So be it if you will, Lucy, and may you never repent your words—Farewell, and may God bless you!'

And so they parted!—with cold looks and averted eyes—they whose hearts had throbbed together with a pure and holy love—who had so often defied all chances and changes to estrange or chill their ardent feelings! And yet a few careless words had effected that, which perchance years of trial and privation might have failed to do. And now, perhaps, if the reader has been interested in this little love-quarrel, he may like to hear some account of the actors therein. Close by the pretty village church of Heathside was a long, grassy lane, bordered by rows of stately elms and skirted by a green coppice which led to one of the most romantic spots in the village, and was much frequented, especially by the younger portion of the community, as it terminated at the residence of the village belle. Lucy Annesley was the only daughter of parents, who at the time of her birth were wealthy citizens, but having subsequently sustained many heavy losses, they had come to Heathside with the remnant of their fortune, content to pass the remainder of their lives in humble quiet. They purchased a small farm, whose products amply sufficed for their own simple wants, and enabled them to add to the comfort and happiness of those around them. Happily for them, their early education had rendered them equal to any fortune; their well balanced minds rose superior to the petty annoyances which they are continually encountering who place their happiness in the idle vanities of outward show. They had never been haughty or supercilious in prosperity, and they shrank not from the averted face or the cold recognition of summer friends, who at the first stroke of adversity fled from their side. A few tried and true ones, whose warm hearts were not easily chilled, yet braved the storm, and their presence occasionally gladdened the humble but happy hearth of Holly-Cot. They found many friends too, among the simple hearted villagers, and in kindly intercourse with them, in visiting the sick and poor in their circumscribed circle, and in the careful training of their little daughter, the Annesleys found little leisure for complaints or repinings, had they been disposed to make them. Happy the child of such parents! whose bodily wants not only are assiduously attended to, but whose intellectual cravings are cared for, and as far as they may be, satisfied. Under such guidance did Lucy Annesley grow to womanhood, beloved and admired by all who knew her. How shall I portray the belle of Heathside? There are some faces which without positive beauty, have yet an equal power of fascination, and haunt us long after they have passed from our sight, like the memory of a pleasant dream, or like a strain of ethereal music, heard in the stillness of a soft, balmy summer eve. Of this character was the face of Lucy Annesley. Few called her beautiful, and yet there was an indescribable charm in the turn of her fine, classic head, and in the graceful movements of her tall, slender figure—in the ever-varying hues of her splendid complexion, and in the brilliancy of her smiles; and then her eyes—ah there was the great attraction of her face—those large, glorious blue eyes, changeable as an April day, now sparkling with mirth and gladness, now glistening with ineffable tenderness, and again, full of the most bewitching softness and languor, which captivated many hearts, even more than the glory of her sunniest smiles. It might have been for this reason that her features so often wore a languishing expression, for Lucy had a considerable spice of coquetry in her composition which she delighted to exercise, and which would have called forth severe rebukes from her friends, had it not been so natural and becoming, so like her own graceful self; and then she had the sweetest of tempers and the kindest of hearts, and it was probably all these attractions combined which gained Lucy Annesley her pre-eminence as the acknowledged and unrivalled belle of Heathside. She had of course many admirers, with some of whom she flirted and made fast friends of others, but the deep affection of her young heart had long been given to one well worthy of it, to Harry Stuart, her playmate and companion from her earliest childhood.

Like him of Nain, Harry Stuart was 'the only son of his mother, and she was a widow.' Very early in life she had alienated herself from a happy home, and angered the fondest of parents by a thoughtless and imprudent marriage with a poor artist—one of those unfortunate men who, possessing the gift of a splendid genius, are unable, or probably do not make the effort, to bring down their imagination from its lofty flights, to pay due attention to the common affairs of life, to those petty cares which make up the sum of each passing day to the poor. The young heiress, brought up in the indulgence of every wish, thought not of all this—she despised money, though no one loved better the show and luxury which the worthless dross procured. She could not be so mercenary as to ask or even think concerning his ability to provide for their mutual subsistence; she was quite sure that she could be very happy with him, in an humble cottage—but then unluckily, her romantic ideas had pictured a cottage, small indeed, but of the genteel sort, and she was quite unprepared for the kind of poverty, which very soon after her marriage began to gather in dark clouds about her home. Amid this night of misfortune the lamp of woman's love shone forth with new and surpassing brilliancy; she strove to atone by her own good management for his deficiencies—but all her industry and economy proved unavailing to counteract the effects of his improvidence. In less than seven years after their marriage, consumption claimed him for its victim, and Mrs. Stuart was left widowed and destitute to struggle through the world with two young children, the elder a boy of five, and the younger a delicate, sickly girl of three, scarcely less helpless than an infant. The young widow had a brave, true heart—its higher powers had been called into vigorous action in the dark season of adversity, and they did not fail her now in her extremity. She looked upon her helpless little ones, upon his children, and rallying all her energies, she girded up her strength and went forth to the conflict. Her parents, who had resolutely refused her all countenance and assistance during Mr. Stuart's life, as soon as they received the intelligence of his death, hastened to offer her aid. The sum, which had she wedded to their liking, would have been her dowry, was settled upon her in the form of a life annuity, and she was urged to return with her children to her early home. But this she was unwilling to do. Mr. Stuart had foreseen the probability of this offer, and on his deathbed he earnestly requested that nothing but the direst necessity should consign his children to the shelter of their roof, who had refused even the balm of kind words to their erring, but repentant child. She preferred rather to dwell in humble seclusion with her little ones, devoting herself to their instruction. Her income though small, was sufficient to support them in a part of the country where the necessities of life were cheap, and Heathside being represented to her as possessing this recommendation, she rented a small, convenient tenement and removed thither. Their new residence was contiguous to Holly-Cot, the home of the Annesleys, and the children of the two families consequently became playmates and school-fellows. Lucy Annesley and Annie Stuart were of the same age, but while the former was a gay, light hearted happy child, buoyant with health, the latter was sickly and feeble; she had even from her birth, been afflicted with a disease of the spine, which increased with her years, and in a year or two after they came to Heathside, she was confined, especially in the winter months, almost wholly to the house. Thus Harry and Lucy grew up together. He was her constant attendant at play or to school, rambling with her through the woodland dell, gathering flowers by the margin of the brook, and twining the beautiful scarlet cardinals among her rich brown curls, and smiling gaily at the reflection of her loveliness in the clear mirror-like wave. Hand in hand, they walked to church and sat side by side in the old square pew, which was jointly occupied by the two families, and the villagers amused by this miniature courtship, gave them the title of the little lovers. As they advanced in years their claim to this title became even more obvious, and the event was considered but as a thing of course, when it was known that Harry Stuart and Lucy Annesley were, to use the Yankee phrase, engaged. Early in life Harry had given strong indications of possessing the genius and talents which had distinguished his unfortunate father, and his mother earnestly strove to give a different bent to his mind and pursuits; and she thankfully accepted an offer made by a friend of her early days, an eminent merchant in a neighboring city, to receive her boy into his counting-room and to fit him for the sober concerns and duties of life. Harry acceded without repining, to all that his mother's experience and better judgment dictated, he performed quietly and faithfully all that was required of him; he ever entered with spirit into all business transactions, and only in his few leisure hours at night or in the week-vacations which were often cheerfully accorded him by his employers, did he give way to his intense love of the arts.

It was during one of these visits at home that the scene with which our story opens took place. It was harvest time, and there had been a merry-making in the village; Harry and Lucy were present, the latter as usual the queen of the feast. Among the guests was a young man of gay, insinuating address and manners, who despite the frowns of her lover, persisted in paying his devoirs to the star of the eve, and Lucy evidently encouraged them, not from any sentiment of admiration or esteem for the man, but simply to gratify the latent love of mischief and flirtation, which as we have already seen, formed an ingredient in her character, and because she saw and felt that Harry was uneasy at witnessing the same. At length, seeing her apparently so fully occupied with the self-conceited fop at her side, Harry forebore to intrude his attentions upon her; but on their way home, he could not refrain from remonstrating with her on the folly and imprudence of the course she was pursuing. Some of his strictures were, though unintentionally, very severe, and the high spirit of Lucy Annesley rebelled against the tone in which they were uttered; the consequence was a separation in sullen pride on her part, in sorrow and wounded feeling on that of her lover. She stood for a moment after his departure, leaning on the little wicket gate, and listened to the sound of his receding footsteps in the lane, and then with a half regretful sigh she closed it and entered the cottage. Her parents were sitting in the little parlor awaiting her return, and talking cheerily of the happiness accorded to them, but she was in no mood for conversation, and pleading a headache she retired to her bed-room.

'I wish I had not been quite so hasty,' she murmured to herself, as she thought of the events of the evening; 'but then I dare say he will be here to-morrow, and I can easily make peace with him'—and with this consolation she resigned herself to sleep. The morrow came, but Harry Stuart did not—the day passed and Lucy's heart misgave her, but still, she thought, something might have occurred to detain him, and she confidently expected to see him in the evening. The hours glided by, and Mr. Annesley, who prized Harry's society highly, inquired the cause of his unwonted tardiness, for during his visits to Heathside, the evenings rarely passed without finding him at Holly-Cot or in company with Lucy. Her parents soon guessed from her evasive answers, and her troubled eye, that something was wrong, and they forebore to question further, though much they wondered what could be the cause. That night Lucy went to bed with an aching heart. That Harry had indeed taken her at her word, she could no longer doubt, and as the conviction forced itself upon her mind, it produced mingled emotions of sorrow and resentment. 'I don't care,' she said to herself, (an expression, by the way, which always convinces me that the speaker does care a great deal) 'he could not have loved me as well as he pretended to do, or he would not have given me up so readily; and after all, he was more to blame than I; what right had he to preach to me in such a manner, and revile William Dale because I chose to flirt with him a little—not that I cared any thing about his attentions, but I wanted to punish Harry for those cross looks he kept giving me when I smiled at Mr. Dale's nonsensical compliments. Heigho! it was foolish to be sure; but then who would have thought Harry Stuart would forget all that has passed between us, just for those few careless words? He said he hoped I would never repent them—Heaven knows I do repent them already!' and as the memories of happy years long past rushed upon her mind, she covered her face with her hands, and with humbled spirit gave way to a gush of repentant tears. She wept herself to sleep, and when the next morning she joined her parents at breakfast, they marked with painful solicitude the swollen eyes and pale cheeks which told of a restless night. That day passed like the preceding without bringing the repulsed lover to sue for the favor of his mistress, and towards twilight Lucy stole forth to take her accustomed ramble with the vague hope of meeting Harry, though she would scarcely have acknowledged it to herself. Her expectations however were not answered, but as she was returning slowly homeward she met a girl from the village, who accosted her with a condolence upon her loss.

'What loss?' exclaimed Lucy, surprised alike at her words and manner.

'The loss of a lover, to be sure,' was the reply. 'You need not pretend to look so astonished, Lucy, for every body in the village knows that Harry Stuart sailed this morning for South America. He is to be gone three years; his mother has wept herself almost blind, and poor Annie is nearly broken-hearted about it. Why bless me, Lucy, what ails you? you are shivering and your teeth chatter as if it were winter.'

'The night is so damp, and I am subject to chills, but here I am at home; good night, Mary'—and Lucy entered the house and proceeding to her own room, she threw herself on the bed and wept aloud with uncontrolled anguish. Her deep sobs reached her mother's ear, and hastening into the room, she strove by kind soothing words to calm the troubled heart of her child; and when the first burst was over, Lucy laid her head on her mother's shoulder and poured forth the tale of her folly and its disastrous consequences. Her repentance came too late. A few days before Harry's visit to Heathside, his employers had made him an offer of a lucrative situation, to go out as their agent to a large commercial establishment in Rio Janeiro. But Harry had too many ties to bind him to his native land, more especially to that small spot of it called Heathside. They insisted, however, on his taking time to consider the matter fully, and after the rupture between Lucy and himself, he did think of it much and deeply. The next day he mentioned the proposal to his mother, and was not surprised to hear her express utter disapprobation of the plan. He heard her objections and combated them steadily, but not till she avowed her surprise that he should be willing to leave home and friends and even Lucy Annesley for the sake of emolument, did the true reason of his desire to do so, transpire. Her consent was at last reluctantly given, his preparations were hastily made, and the vessel being ready, he sailed as Lucy had been told, on the fourth day after their separation. That night a letter was placed in her hands, which she read with many tears, and then gave to her mother for perusal. The contents of the missive never gained publicity, consequently we cannot impart them to the reader, but from that day there was a visible change in the manners and deportment of Lucy Annesley. The next morning found her an early visitant at the cottage of the Stuarts; at first, the mother's smile of greeting was faint and cold, but Lucy's visit was prolonged, and when she left the house, her step was light, and there was a bloom on her cheek and a softness in her eye, which told that an errand of peace had been accomplished.

Three years passed away, bringing the usual routine of chances and changes, from which the good villagers of Heathside were not exempt. Many a hoary headed father and mother in Israel had been gathered by the Reaper, like a shock of corn ripe for the harvest, into the great garner, and they had joyfully exchanged the poor, perishing possessions of earth, for the 'everlasting inheritance that fadeth not away.' Nor to them alone had the summons come—to the middle aged, to manhood in its first bloom and in its meridian pride—to light-hearted youth, buoyant with hopes for the future with its untried joys—to the smiling infant, cradled in its mother's arms—to the bright-eyed, sunny-lipped maiden in the first flush of beauty and happiness, and to the dignified matron, the centre of a lovely and beloved circle. This may seem to many a dark picture—and yet why should it thus appear? 'It is appointed unto men once to die'—and 'blessed are the dead who die in the Lord'—yea, thrice blessed is he, who, 'living, believeth—he shall never die!' But death had not been alone in his ministrations at Heathside—the angel of joy had there shown his reviving presence, and dispensed his rich gifts at many a hearth-stone. Light had shone into many a darkened soul—smiles had re-lit the eyes whose lustre had been dimmed by midnight vigils and heart-wrung tears—travellers from land and sea, embrowned by sun and toil, and hardships, had returned to gladden loving eyes—and poor wanderers long estranged from peace and purity, had come, like the Prodigal, acknowledging their unworthiness, and were received joyfully into the fold, whose good Shepherd hath said, 'He that cometh to me will I in no wise cast out.' Young and loving hearts had been joined in holiest bonds, and happy voices chimed merrily in long desolate homes.

And Lucy Annesley—what changes had those three years wrought in her? No longer the belle, though still the fairest maiden of Heathside, time had ripen-ed and matured her loveliness—she was less pretty, but more beautiful than ever; her coquettish airs had given place to a gentle and womanly dignity, and she was no longer the pet and plaything, but the friend and companion of her parents—no longer the gay butterfly, sporting in the sunbeams, or a drone in the great human hive, but an industrious bee gathering sweets from every blossom it lighted on. Lucy was now a welcome visitant in the cottages of the poor—for her sweet voice spake words of peace and love, and gave blessed assurance of imperishable treasures, of 'riches without wings.' She came to the bed of sickness with soothing accents that were like reviving cordials to the sinking heart—and for the dying she had rich promises, which like radiant sunbeams pierced the thick shadows of the valley of death. To the house of mourning she brought comfort and consolation, and to the festal board smiles of sympathy. She was 'eyes to the blind and ears to the deaf,' and young and old blessed her as a ray of sunlight in their path. But next to her own parents, to the mother and sister of Harry Stuart, was she peculiarly devoted; she felt that to her folly was owing the absence of their natural protector, and she strove as far as she might to supply his place to them. Poor Annie Stuart's disease had finally terminated in incurable deformity; she was confined to her room, almost entirely to her bed, and she derived great pleasure from hearing Lucy read her favorite authors, as for a year past she had been unable to do so herself. Knowing the cause of Harry's departure, Mrs. Stuart had at first felt a considerable degree of resentment towards Lucy, but when on the morning of her first visit after that event, Lucy with tears of bitter but unavailing repentance acknowledged her folly, and prayed her forgiveness, the mother's heart warmed towards her, and for the love she bore her son, she received and cherished the poor girl who had thus wrecked her own happiness. Mrs. Stuart was often gladdened by letters from her absent son; he was prosperous and hoped to return at the appointed time with enlarged means of usefulness. All that related to his prosperity and health, his mother regularly communicated to Lucy, but she carefully kept to herself certain passages, containing earnest and repeated inquiries concerning Miss Annesley, of her health, her appearance, and above all, her continued devotion to himself. Gladly would Mrs. Stuart have told her of his unchanging love, of the sacrifice it had been to leave her, and of the ardor with which he looked forward to his return; but it was her wish as well as her son's, that Lucy's lesson should be an abiding one.

The three years had now passed away—the term of Harry's absence and of Lucy's probation, and one day as they sat together by Annie's bed, from which the physician informed them that she would never rise again, Mrs. Stuart communicated the joyful intelligence which she had just received, that the vessel in which her son had taken passage, had reached the home-port, and that he would soon be with them. For a moment a bright smile illumined Lucy's face, but it quickly faded, and the tears started to her eyes. Pleading indisposition, she excused herself to her friends, and hastened home, and seeking the seclusion of her bed-room, she carefully examined the state of her heart. During those three years, she had rejected several proposals of marriage, without even asking herself the reason, but now that reason was plain to her mind, and she was forced to confess to herself, despite her maiden pride, that her heart was no less devoted to Harry Stuart now, than when in their childish days every word and every act had made it apparent. But she determined to go to the Stuart's cottage no more, well as she loved its inmates; and though conscience was upbraiding her with the selfishness which could allow her to desert the poor deformed Annie in her sickness, she adhered to her resolution one day; on the second a messenger came to summon her to Annie's death-bed. Harry had not yet arrived, and the mother was sorrowing alone over her pale, dying child, who in feeble accents was striving to comfort her. Lucy sat down at the side of her old playmate and companion, and whispered words of encouragement in the ear which was fast growing dull to all earthly sounds, and pictured the delights of heaven to the soul whose earthly visions were fading.

'I have but one wish ungratified,' murmured the dying girl. 'I would fain see Harry ere I die—I would like to hear his dear voice once more, and then I would be content; you will not weep to lay me at rest in the green church-yard, for I am a poor deformed creature who can give no pleasure to any one, and dear Lucy will be a daughter to you as she has been a kind and tender sister to me. Will you not, dearest Lucy?' But ere the weeping maiden could reply, the cottage gate was unclosed, and a quick step was heard on the gravel walk—the door opened and in another moment Harry Stuart in his dusty and travel-worn habiliments, stood by the death-bed of his only sister. Her wish was granted. His hand was upon her cold, wasted brow, his voice, half choked by tears, murmured, 'My poor Annie!' With a last effort she raised herself from the pillow and throwing her arms about his neck, she laid her head on his bosom, and without a sigh her pure spirit returned to Him who gave it. For a moment not a sound broke the stillness—and then imprinting a kiss on that marble forehead, the brother laid her down again and received the greeting of his mother who had thus welcomed one child and parted from another. While the mother and son were thus engaged, Lucy sought an opportunity to steal away unobserved, but ere she had reached the green lane mentioned in the early part of our story, she was joined by another person, and a voice whose tones could never be forgotten, pronounced her name. Though trembling all over, she turned towards him, and with a considerable degree of composure returned his salutation, and congratulated him on his safe return.

'And can I believe,' he replied, 'that my safety is a matter of any regard to Miss Annesley? that time and absence have produced any change in her feelings towards Harry Stuart? Lucy, three years ago, this very lane was the scene of that miserable dispute which caused this long and to me, weary separation. In a foreign land I have looked anxiously forward to this day of re-union—it has come at last, and may I hope that this same spot may be hallowed by a mutual forgiveness and reconciliation—may I bear to the mother who is mourning over her child, the glad tidings that she hath still a daughter? Speak to me Lucy, but one word!'

But Lucy could not speak—sobs and tears choked her utterance, but she suffered her lover to retain the hand he had taken; their walk was prolonged, and when they parted at the gate of Holly-Cot, where three years before the words had been uttered which sent Harry Stuart to a distant land, it was felt and understood by both, that they were again affianced lovers.

Poor Annie was consigned to her quiet grave, and there did Mrs. Stuart receive the intelligence that she was no longer daughterless. Ere many months had passed, Annie's last wish was accomplished, and the village church was the scene of a happy bridal—the union of two hearts chastened and purified by suffering and consecrated by a long and well tried affection. Lucy has long been a happy and beloved wife, sons and daughters are gathered around her hearth-stone, and she lives, blessing and blest indeed, but never in the course of her long life has she found cause to regret her lover's bitter but salutary LESSON.

THE DEATH CHAMBER.

BY MRS. E. A. BACON.

OUR sister is dying! O mark you each day
How softly her spirit is gliding away!
That flush on her cheek, and that light in her eye,
O sadly they warn us the moment is nigh.

It is nigh, it is nigh, O we all feel it now,
As we part the damp hair on her colorless brow;
How tearful the glances, and silent the tread,
As love watches over her languishing bed.

Yet why do we sorrow? O look on that face,
No vestige of earthliness there we can trace;
A smile resteth on it all glowing with love,
For the angels are whispering of mansions above.

Shall we mourn that so early her journey is o'er,
That so soon she will rest on that beautiful shore,

Where glories eternal will burst on her view,
Which our eyes have not seen and our hearts never knew?

O it is not for thee, blessed sister, we grieve,
But for all the sad places thy spirit must leave;
We sigh for the hearthstone where love ever smiled,
The early bereaved one, and motherless child!

But joyful the thought when this dust turns to dust,
A glorious pathway will open for us;
Our sister beholds it, O hushed be that moan!
She is leading the way to our heavenly home.

ENGLAND.

BY REV. JOHN G. ADAMS.

THE CONDITION AND FATE OF ENGLAND. By the Author of 'The Glory and Shame of England.' In Two Volumes. New York: J. & H. G. Langley; 1843.

If there are any who have not yet read the work just named;—any who are disposed to read candidly; and who have good hearts to feel;—and who, moreover, will not suffer the ordinary 'Literary Notices' of our newspapers to make up for them an opinion beforehand;—and, once more, who are not so bedazzled with England's great name and external splendor as to be deaf and blind when this book with an audible voice comes up before them;—if there are any be the number small or great, who are really thus qualified, we say unto them in spirit and in truth—obtain this book, and make yourselves acquainted with its contents.

We have had copious 'Notes' on our own country from all kinds and descriptions of English travelling and writing spectators. They have written, too, under all kinds of impressions, and have told much truth of us—much disagreeable as well as pleasing truth. And as it cannot be doubted that we have been somewhat benefited by looking at our own likenesses thus drawn, in the past, so we may be equally and perhaps doubly benefited in the future. Many dark pages can be written of us. We are yet sinners, and open to harrowing rebuke and thundering admonition. We have radical agrarian democrats, stiff-necked and overbearing aristocrats, out-breakings of Lynch law and mobocracy, slaves and slave-holders, bankrupts, repudiators, and all. Let us not seek to cloak our national sin.

And of all this, let legions of our English brethren and sister authors write, till pen, ink and paper fail; if they go not beyond the truth, they cannot draw such pictures, saddening and bewildering to the philanthropic soul, of this our land, as the author of this searching volume has chronicled of that haughty, far-striding, and all-grasping giant among the nations—England.

I intend no review of the work. I only write of its impressions on my own mind. To follow in detail the subjects presented by the author, would require more time than is now at my disposal. Yet a word en passant I must utter.

The author of this work writes like one who has well matured his subject, and who has evidence in abundance on hand to prove over and over again all his statements. He pretends not to be a prophet, notwithstanding some of our periodicals in their notice of his work have treated him as though he had made such pretension. He goes back to the very infancy of England—shows the early developments of its character—the evil influences in operation upon it—and brings before us in representations far enough from mere imagining, the present condition of the British nation. He ventures boldly and freely to speak of its fate; and we do not see how any one who will steadily survey the whole ground here marked out, can question the reasonableness of his opinions.

The following synopsis of the topics comprised in this work, will give the reader some idea of its character.

Book I. Embraces a view of the power and magnificence of the British Empire, with illustrations of the spirit of the feudal and of the modern age.

Book II. The general condition of the mass of the British people in past ages—their burdens and sufferings during centuries of unrelieved oppression.

Book III. The injustice, wrongs, and oppressive laws under which the majority of the British people are now struggling.

Book IV. A continuation of the same subject, including a Reply to a recent publication, entitled 'The Fame and Glory of England Vindicated,' by an anonymous libeller of the Democratic institutions of this country, written over the signature of 'Libertas.'

Book V. The sufferings and crime, the ignorance and degradation, caused by the oppressive burdens of the people.

Book VI. Glances at the woes and struggles of Ireland, under the tyrannical power of England, and her only hope of relief.

Book VII. The feelings of the people under a sense of the deep injustice they have so long endured, and their determination to suffer the slavery no longer.

Book VIII. The opposition of the Aristocracy to the Liberties of the people, and their determination still to keep them in subjection.

Book IX. The progress of the Democratic Principle throughout the world, and especially in Great Britain.

Book X. The final issue of this conflict—Reform or Revolution.

And under these various heads, this vigorous and beautiful writer does 'a tale unfold' that will not operate in suppressing the conviction of England's perfidy and abomination. When such startling and heaven-daring outrages are laid open to us; when the oppression of the government, the misery of the poor, the deaf ear of Parliament to the just demands of the laboring classes, all become known, and are held up, as here, in the light of noon-day,—it is not for insulted humanity to keep silent valiant and noble as England may have been called in her conquests and in some of her public benefactions, it cannot be overlooked that she is corrupted—horribly—fatally; and that a crisis must come. And although we pray God it may be a bloodless one, we have Christian courage enough to say, let it come! Patience is exhausted in torture; all the powers of humanity within seem paralyzed as the ten thousands of squallid, hungering, dying and forsaken of England and Ireland are in array before us. Miserable beings,—deserving, demanding, praying for relief—a relief which would cost but little indeed, if the true justice and glory of England were equal to its high-sounding impudence and pretension.

There must be judgment somewhere. God's eye is surely upon us; and nations cannot escape the evils they justly incur—although for awhile these evils seem to linger. Surely if any thing would shake our faith in the moral government of Jehovah, it would be the conviction that the groans and cries of the millions who have been crushed beneath the iron heel of British oppression do not call up in some hour of retribution hosts of the great and true hearted who shall set aside that throne of noisy and insulting memory, and in place thereof rear one of the holiest altars of Freedom.

But God reigns; therefore we look for justice and judgment, although sometimes to our limited vision clouds and darkness may be round about his throne. It cannot be that Christian truth—that humanity—that philanthropy will now go back. Too great an impulse has been given them for that. And if they go onward, oppression and tyranny, servitude and social and political degradation have heard their death notes. The clouds are breaking—the clear sky is seen. Our own age begins to glow with light; and the nations must arise and be judged therein. She among them who has been one of the pioneers of civilization and even professed keeper and defender of Christianity, will yet be compelled, as all other nations will, to humble herself, repent of her sins and abominations, make all practicable repairs of wrongs committed, take the stand in Freedom's mighty army, and contend earnestly for the rights of man. Sidney and Hampden will live again. Emmett will come forth. Pitt's eloquence shall roll back its thunder tones, and Brougham's spirit mount from its present elevation, to join the glad triumph-shout of a ransomed people! As the Lord liveth we believe that righteousness and truth will thus prevail.

And if Christians have the spirit of prayer, let them not stifle it in this hour. Prayer, prayer for the suffering oppressed! prayer for their oppressors! Prayer for our own country in view of its enormities; prayer for England in her deep, awful sins! Prayer and intercession that these two mighty nations may come forth in God's name—raise the standard of Truth and Freedom, and lead the way for the establishing of all the nations in holiness and peace.

PAST IMMORTALITY.

Who may set bounds unto our past existence,
Or tell in what bright glory beaming star,
Dim seen through an immeasurable distance,
Moving with spheric melodies afar,
Ere first from chaos rose this time-worn earth,
The godlike soul had birth?

The fleshly veils of this, our earthly being,
Enshroud the bright divinity within,
The mists of time encloud our 'inward seeing,'
The heaven-lit life-lamp here wanes low and dim,
And the sweet hymnings of our natal sphere
Have faded from the ear!

Chaldaic Magii, who with piercing vision
Read, as an opened scroll the stars of old,
The hidden mysteries of those realms Elysian,
Did to the wondering gaze of man unfold;
But they have gone, nor left their lore sublime,
To us of later time!

And yet the spirit, while by gloom unclouded
It wings its way through time's mysterious night,
Although its inward brilliancy is clouded,
Sees still faint glimpses of a by-gone light,
As when at eve, the sun no more is seen,
The golden cloudlets gleam!

All the sweet melodies that nature singeth,
The wildly heaving ocean's ceaseless moan,
Each voice with which the dim old forest ringeth,
The flowret-hidden streamlet's silvery tone,
And all the anthem voices of the blast,
Speak of the faded past.

And singeth Memory, Time's angelic daughter,
Mysterious legends of the golden age,
Floating along the past's dim mist-veiled water,
Their dreamy murmurs glad our pilgrimage,
Sweet as a star-lit fountain's glimmering flow
We hear those breathings low!

Why is it that a mystic tie entwinedeth,
Hearts that here never even met, in one?
As dew-drops decked, with which the rainbow shineth,
In falling mingle, and together run,
So ages since, in some far realm they met,—
The soul may ne'er forget!

Upon the spirit's tablet, deeply graven,
Is its past immortality entranced;

There countless ages since high thoughts were written,
 Never to be by Time's cold touch effaced,
 When first from God the immortal spirit sprung,—
 Light from the Sun!

MODERN SAMARITANS.

THE references to the Samaritans in the New Testament give a peculiar interest to any thing pertaining to that people, and the following account of a visit to a remnant who still cherish all of the ancient enmity which divided Jew and Samaritan, cannot fail to be of intense interest to our readers. We take it from 'The Monthly Miscellany,' where we find it abridged from Dr. Bowring's 'Sketches of Oriental Religions.' The account will be found quite graphic.

'I paid two visits to Nablous, the Shechem of the Old Testament, the Sychar of the New, the ancient capital of Samaria, and still the principal town of the district. On both occasions my place of abode was the residence of the Governor, who is the head of the most distinguished family in that part of the country. I expressed to him an earnest desire to be introduced to the Samaritans of Sychar, and to learn something of their present condition. He said he knew little about them himself; that there were among them no persons of rank or influence, but that they were mostly engaged in the humbler walks of life; that their number was small; that they were not molested on account of their opinions; but that, moreover, his principal scribe was a Samaritan, and a leading person among the Samaritans; that he would order him to attend upon me, to escort me about, to introduce me to his people, and to give me every information I might desire to obtain.

'Our morning collation was scarcely over, ere the Samaritan appeared,—a tall, handsome and venerable, though not a very aged man, with dark and piercing eyes, a long black beard, and clad in the large turban and long garments of Syria, distinguishable in no respects from those usually worn. I arranged with him to visit the Samaritan temple and the Chief Priest, and succeeded, after a short intercourse, in establishing those frank communications which are so often interfered with by the distance and the formalities of Levantine usages.

'I found that the number of Samaritan families now living at Sychar is eleven, consisting of about 120 persons. They are very careful in their registrations of births, marriages and deaths, and profess to have the ancestry of the principal individuals of their body up to the time of Moses. "The numbering of the people" takes place every year, and they assured me they observed the greatest accuracy in their family records. Their numbers had at one period been reduced to as low as sixty individuals, but they were now somewhat on the increase. For their Chief Priest, who, as they avow, is directly descended from Shem, (and who himself wrote out for me his family genealogy in Arabic,) they entertain the highest reverence: His influence over the little community seems boundless. They told me they had no positive information of any Samaritans except themselves, who "all worshipped on Mount Gerizim," but they had heard that some of their faith were scattered in distant lands and still preserved the religious usages of their forefathers. They had even been told that there were Samaritans in England, and in the English countries to the East, (meaning British India,) and were very curious to know whether I knew or had ever heard of such Samaras, or "Samaritans," and whether it would be possible to establish intercourse with them. They seemed much afflicted when I told them, I believed there was no reason to suppose that any of their race existed in any portion of the British empire. They said they had been visited by many Christians, and especially by English Christians, of whom they spoke with great respect, and asked me to explain why a nation so far away should take any interest in a few poor families who were neither Christians, nor Jews, nor Musstilmans. I asked them whether they had ever heard that our Prophet had spoken of one of their nation as the Good Samaritan—referring to his conduct as a model of humanity and charity? I repeated to them the parable as it was taught by our Savior, and the Chief Priest answered, "We had at that time a good Hakim (physician) amongst us—surely it must have been he!" And they told me of a tradition among them, that this Hakim was universally honored for his active beneficence. Had their tradition its origin in Christian history, or was the parable of Jesus itself a reference to a tradition existing in the time of our Lord?

'I was escorted by the Samaritan scribe to the temple, through many dark and winding streets. On reaching the portal he required me to take off my shoes, as did he and the other worshippers, some of whom were in the act of prayer—prostrate on the ground—with their foreheads pressing the dust. The Chief Priest came to meet me,—a man of calm, sober and imposing mien, with a long white beard, little distinguished from those around him by his dress; his countenance, however, and the countenances around me, having nothing of the Hebrew expression, but resembling much those of the Druses of Mount Lebanon, the ancient Syrian race. His reception was most cordial. He introduced to me his son and his son's sons, his successors in the priesthood, which he said he had held by inheritance from the time of the giving of the Law. He spoke calmly of Christians and Mussulmans, but of the Jews with extreme bitterness, as corrupters of the Holy Book, who had turned away the true worshippers from the sacred Mount Gerizim. He brought from the interior of the temple the ancient copy of the Pentateuch, which he assured me was the unpolluted original, and was 3460 years old. It was in a silvered tin case covered with scarlet silk; he allowed me to unroll it. Its appearance is of a far higher antiquity than any MSS. I have ever seen. It has been carefully and frequently repaired; it is in the old Samaritan character, and I found it was read with facility by himself and his descendants, and was habitually used in the service of the temple. But the language has ceased to be employed for colloquial purposes among the Samaritans, though they all profess to understand it,—and they may perhaps, to about the same extent in which Hebrew is understood by the Jews. The Chief Priest frequently reverted to the controversy as to the superior sanctity of Mount Gerizim or Jerusalem. "Here is the Law," he said, "here is the Book,—here are the very words. They (the Jews) could not deny the authority, so they falsified the passage." I obtained from the Chief Priest a specimen—a very tolerable fac-simile of a part of the Samaritan Pentateuch, and the scribe promised that he would give me a copy of the verse which the Jews are asserted to have eliminated from the original text; but I have not yet received it.

'In their domestic manners and customs, the Samaritans are but little distinguished from the races that surround them. They are bigamists, but not polygamists, and divorce is of easy attainment. Their women veil themselves like the Syrians in general; for the practice of veiling now pervades all classes; and I have often heard it inquired by Syrian Christian ladies, "whether the respectable women of England were so immodest as to walk out with uncovered faces?" It would not appear that the use of the veil was so universal in the patriarchal times, nor was it habitual. It is recorded of Rebecca that she veiled herself, but only when Isaac approached her as a stranger; when she rode on her camel in the presence of her servants her face was uncovered; and in the case of Tamar, the circumstance of her being veiled was deemed injurious to her reputation. But in the apostolic times the veiling or covering the head had become a general practice; and Mahomet, whose ritual recognized so many of the usages of Oriental life, made the veiling of women a peremptory religious duty. In fact, a stronger reproach cannot be addressed to a Mussulman lady than that her face has been seen out of the harem; and in these particulars the Samaritans are not distinguished from their neighbors.

But small as is their number, great is their national pride. The Chief Priest told me he considered they were the appointed conservators of the purity of the Mosaic faith,—the guardians of Holy Writ,—the favorites of Jehovah, into whose hands were committed, to be preserved through all time, the truths communicated to the patriarch by the great Lawgiver. He referred to the preservation of their Pentateuch as an evidence of Divine favor. Our land, said he, has passed from conqueror to conqueror,—we have been persecuted by one set of invaders after another,—our town, our country, have been the seat of civil war,—three times have we been compelled to hide our Holy Book in the recesses of Mount Gerizim, where it once remained concealed for more than seventy years;—but we still exist, a nation apart, with our own temple, our language, the customs of our fathers; and you see before you now three generations of our priests,—myself, my son and my son's sons, (pointing to a middle-aged man who hung over him while he was speaking, and to two little boys who were sitting at his feet.)

'I requested him to read some passages in the Pentateuch. He unrolled the MS., and putting his finger under the letters, he read several verses, his son accompanying him, and the Samaritan scribe who had been my guide joining in the erudite attempt. They had little of the Hebrew intonation, they read readily, and I observed that some of those present knew the passages by heart, for they anticipated the readings of the Chief Priest.

'There are four yearly festivals on Mount Gerizim, accompanied by religious ceremonies. At the principal one (the Passover) the whole body of Samaritans attend, and the scribe told me it was a very imposing and interesting festivity, with much rejoicing and feasting, and songs and sports. The other three assemblies were less important, but were usually attended by all the Samaritans, though the attendance was not considered so religiously obligatory as at the Passover. It is on these four occasions that they consider themselves more peculiarly called upon to proclaim the sanctity of Mount Gerizim, and believe that they offer the most acceptable worship to the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob.

'I thought it was likely the strong language of the Chief Priest against the Jews was the outbreaking of ecclesiastical gall, and might not be the expression of the general opinion. The scribe was a man of mild and gentle manners, and I asked him what were the feelings of the Samaritans generally towards the Hebrews. "We have no love to them in our hearts," was his reply. I inquired of the scribe what was the worldly condition of the Chief Priest. He said he was poor, and that any present would be most welcome; in fact, he rather strongly urged me to leave with the old man some mark of kindness. He did this in a way by no means offensive or intrusive, and I found his expectations were of a moderate character. In truth, the whole body of the Samaritans, though removed from abject poverty, are not many degrees above that condition. I inquired who was the richest man among them, and was told that 2000 piastres (£20 sterling) was probably the largest fortune among them. But the Mahomedan Governor bore testimony to their general respectability. He said they were a quiet and a harmless people, and among the most trustworthy of the population of Nablous. The Governor, however, did not confirm their statements as to their unshaken fidelity to the faith of their fathers. He said that many of them had become Mussulmans, and that there had been a notable diminution of their numbers. As a community, their education is decidedly above the average of that of the Syrian population. I found no man among them who was not able to write, and the scribe told me it was their custom to instruct their children.

I asked the Chief Priest to explain to me what were their differences with the Jews except in the matter of the place whence worship was most acceptably addressed to Jehovah. "We have more than a hundred points of difference," he said; but he always reverted to the adulteration of the text which gave preference to Jerusalem over Mount Gerizim. He rather invited a controversy with the Jews. "Why," said he, "do not they come and examine the Holy Book? Why will they not look into the MS.? Here it is. If they are desirous of ascertaining the truth, they have the opportunity of doing so." Certainly, the old man spoke as if under the influence of a strong conviction. He complained bitterly of the irreverence with which the Jews treated their sabbath. "They spend it," he said, "in their synagogues; and when they leave their synagogues, their sabbath is passed for them. But we,—we go into the mountain to worship, and the whole day is a day of prayer."

The enmity against the Jews is so strong, that no Hebrew is admitted into the Samaritan synagogue. Happily, the ill-will that exists has seldom an opportunity of wreaking itself on individuals; for in Nablous there are no resident Jews, and it may be doubted if any of the Samaritans ever come in contact with their rivals. The Governor told me he was not sure that the Jews ever visited his capital. I had no opportunity of ascertaining whether the feeling of dislike was reciprocal between them and the Samaritans. Perhaps few of them are aware of the existence of any of the Samaritan race.

The existence of the Samaritans in their present unchanged condition, representing as they do the habits, language, opinions and ritual of their ancient nation, is one of the most interesting facts with which I am acquainted. During my abode among them, I could not dissociate my mind from the fancy that I was living in the very days of the Apostles. So little altered was the phraseology, so kindred the prejudices, so similar the worship, to those of which the narrative of the New Testament has conveyed to us the record, that I could hardly fancy sixty generations had passed away since the time when that narrative was written; for as every fact reported is accordant with the existing state of things, so there is an abiding truth and life in every touch left by the Gospel historians. My second visit to Nablous was the sequence of my being unable to enter Jerusalem, in consequence of the plague having broken out in the Holy City; but the disappointment has almost ceased to be a subject of regret, when I think of the opportunity which that disappointment gave me of passing another day at the foot of Mount Gerizim among the men and women of Samaria,—still to be seen, still to be studied, in all that characterized them when Jesus and the Apostles sojourned among them more than eighteen centuries ago.

A MEMORIAL OF HAPPY DAYS.

AFFECTIONATELY INSCRIBED TO S. C. E.

Dost thou remember, Sarah, those sunny days gone by,
When the hours on fairy pinions, like minutes, seemed to fly?

When the glorious Indian summer smiled on mountain-top and plain,
And the farmer's heart exulted in his stores of golden grain?

The earth had not yet wholly doffed her robes of emerald green,
And the brilliant hues of Autumn added beauty to the scene.

The sun, its gorgeous splendors shed on valley, hill, and stream,
And in our hearts, as brightly, did Affection's sunlight gleam!

And dost thou not remember all the pleasant walks we took?
That woodland path that wound along the margin of a brook,
On whose clear breast, like glory-rays, the glittering sunbeams played—
And the slant old trees, whose shadows fell athwart the forest glade?

O many a richly varied scene of river, wood and glen,
Within a city's bounds, yet far from busy haunts of men;
Scenes that together we enjoyed doth fancy now delight,
To bring in startling vividness, each hour before my sight.

Those halcyon hours, all too bright, too beautiful to last,
O can they e'er become to thee, dim records of the past?
Hath not each well remembered look, each tone of love a spell?
Are they not fondly garnered up, in memory's choicest cell?

The friends whose love and kindness made those days so truly blest,
Howe'er they may be sundered now—a blessing on them rest!

The group who sadly seek a new and less beloved home,
May fortune smile upon their path, where'er their footsteps roam.

To her, who meekly languishes upon a couch of pain,
O speedily may heaven restore the boon of health again!
To glad the hearts to whom her smile is dear as light of day,
And bid the angel Joy return where grief hath held her sway.

God bless those 'Soldiers of the Cross!' the zealous, brave and true,
Who side by side fought valiantly—whose 'souls together grew!'
Long may their clarion-voices sound SALVATION through the land,
And every work of Love Divine be prospered in their hand.
Why ask—'Dost thou remember?'—oh canst thou e'er forget
That gay and happy circle who in sweet communion met?
Will not those pleasant memories still linger round thine heart,
Like withered flowers whose scent remains when life and bloom depart?
O never more, perchance, that group shall gather round
one hearth,
For chance and change, too well we know marks every thing of earth!
But in the glorious spirit-clime, where endless spring-time dwells,
A happier meeting shall be ours—that knows no sad fare*wells!*

VENERATION.

ALL persons possess this quality in a greater or less degree. Some individuals take pride in possessing but little veneration—believing it a mark of independence and self-sufficiency. Reason should govern in all things; and there is doubtless some danger of venerating objects and persons who are unworthy of such distinction. There are some who are so much disposed to venerate others, that they can scarcely be said to have an opinion of their own; or to be even the master of their own actions. This is wrong, for we are told that 'one is your master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren.'

Again, there are some who are not willing to acknowledge that one Master—but they declare that man is himself a first principle, and not an agent—that he is all-sufficient in himself, and may act, on every occasion, without reference to a higher power.

It is impossible that men who act upon such ground can be happy. Man is a dependant being. We have but to open our eyes in order to see this. If the pride of man is hurt at such a contemplation, it is the fault of his own heart—that ignorance which is engendered by living in the world, without an attempt to become acquainted with the character of its Creator.

When we obtain just ideas of the Supreme Being, we shall not seek to throw off his authority. The doctrines of partialism may drive men into singular straits, and may induce them to form theories inconsistent with common sense—but a knowledge of the true character of God will reconcile us to his government, and we will no longer strive to be independent of his rule. The false doctrines of endless misery have been the stumbling block which has made more unbelievers than every thing else besides.

When we are so unreasonable as to seek total independence, and to flatter ourselves that this is a mark of spirit and strength of mind, we have but to open our eyes to the truth, and the shadow vanishes. We know that we are not infinite in knowledge, because we have often been mistaken, and because there are many things in the outward creation for which we cannot account. We also know that we have existed for but a short term of years, and that once we had no being at all—that revolutions, that changes and remarkable incidents were transpiring long before we had any existence. We are not infinite in power, because those changes have an influence upon us at this day—although we had no agency in bringing them about. Other men separated this country from the English crown, and we are therefore born in a land of freedom. Sir Isaac Newton and others made discoveries in science, without our assistance, and we therefore know more than we should have known, had not those intellectual stars arisen. We also see that there is a sky above us—a sun to give us light over which we have no control, and stars which we would never be able to extinguish, though we lived ten thousand years. The elements of our own world also operate on us. We are chilled by the cold which we cannot command, and the heat oppresses us, and we cannot stay its power. We are influenced by our own bodily constitutions which are just as we found them, and which we cannot alter as we list. Do we take pride in our personal strength? A feather may strangle us, and put a final end to it all. Are we vain of our talents? A short illness or a violent accident may destroy our reason forever.

As we are not infinite—as we have not even the control over our own destinies, we are dependant beings. Those things upon which we most highly value ourselves are not of our own producing. Those things which we do produce we could never bring to light but by the aid of Him who sendeth the early and the latter rain, and who upholds all things, our own lives among the number.

It is therefore perfectly just, and consonant with right reason that we should possess the quality of veneration. We must look out of ourselves, if we look at any thing but ourselves; and we must look either up or down. We must look either at those things which are above us, or those which are beneath us. This we must, of course, do in childhood. The child would learn nothing if it did not look up to its elders for information; and those of mature age, who would learn any thing from their fellow-men, must look up to them, as wiser than themselves in those peculiar branches wherein they desire to be instructed. The man who goes to hear a lecture on phrenology, anatomy, or geology, naturally looks up to the lecturer for information, and he so far venerates his instructor. The man who supposes that another person is his superior, both in moral and intellectual qualities, and yet does not venerate is unjust, and cares not for greatness. His must be a grovelling mind, indeed, who does not admire and venerate that which is superior to himself.

But veneration is also a pleasing exercise of the mind. This all history verifies; for if it were not so, men would not have made to themselves kings and nobles, in order that they might have some one to look up to. Yet this is an unreasonable exercise of this quality—since kings and nobles may be mere men of straw who possess no qualities deserving of our reverence. The Israelites desired to have a king, like the nations round about—but this was a weak ambition, and the God of their fathers granted their wish because they would have it so.

But it is not in the exalting of men to imaginary dignities that the quality of veneration alone exhibits itself. All nations have had something to worship, in the shape of gods—beings superior to any of their own race, supposed to be endued with supernatural power. These inventions took their rise from the inherent love of veneration in the mind of man—a principle proper to man, because he is a finite and dependant being. But not only so, it is because he is a progressive being also. He looks up to what is above him, not only because he appreciates its greatness, but also because he is capable of rising to greater degrees of excellence.

What we love and admire, we naturally strive to imitate. If we do not admire that which is above us, we shall not strive to imitate it. The painter who has no admiration of those specimens preserved of the great masters of the art—no enthusiastic love of their excellencies will never become a great painter like unto them. Now it is impossible that a finite being should ever become infinite, and therefore however great may be our veneration of the Supreme Being, we may never hope to equal him. Yet in so far as we may approach his perfections, we have an example in his Son Jesus Christ who came into the world to be an example to us. He says, 'Those that have seen me, have seen the Father also,' because in our present condition we can conceive of no nearer approach to the character of the Supreme Being than that afforded by the example of Jesus Christ. All that man can do, while on earth, to approximate to the character of God, was done by him. No man can come to the Father but by him, because when we become like him, we have taken upon ourselves the nature of God as far as man can do. He is the way, the truth and the light.

Let us not marvel that God hath commanded us to worship Him—since by this very act, our own happiness is secured. We can add nothing to the greatness of God by our adoration—but he created us that we might become like Him and be a sharer in his happiness. By the exercise of veneration, with the Supreme Being for its object, we become elevated in the scale of being, to the rank of angels, and we are consequently made happy. It is, then, not only a duty, but also the highest privilege to worship God, and to love him.

I have shown that we cannot well avoid venerating something. Why not then venerate Him who is every thing good, and in whom there is no evil at all? Why not love light in preference to darkness, and goodness in preference to evil? We never can be happy in any other way—for there is no other name given by which men can be saved, but by the name of Jesus Christ. On the other hand, the man of the world venerates houses and lands—dust and ashes—and what is the consequence? He goes through the world like a reed shaken with the wind; for those things which he loves fade away and perish with the using. I would, therefore, impress upon the mind of the reader the truth, that it is the highest privilege of man to worship the perfect God.

CEPHAS.

Boston, Mass.

THE WORLD ABOVE.

THERE is a land of undecaying glory,
Far from the unrealities of this,
And not a shade of life's lamented story,
Can ever mar its purity and bliss.
Beyond the ken of man's enfeebled vision,
And all the fading objects of his love,
Is that far, undiscovered clime Elysian,
That brighter world above.

There are innumerable amaranthine bowers,
Through which no bleak autumnal breezes sigh,
Decked with most delicately pencilled flowers,
Unlike earth's evanescent ones that die.
And all those flowers so modestly up-springing,
And beautifying each celestial grove,
Upon the air are perfumed incense flinging,
In that bright world above.

King Death, who unrelentingly effaces,
The glory of these perishable frames,
And gathers them to his sepulchral places,
To swell the numbers in his dim domains,
Has no possessions in that bright dominion,
No sphere in which his shapeless form may move;
He may not spread his cold, oblivious pinion
In that bright world above.

There is no darkness in that realm of glory,
For night can never find admittance there;
Its every vale and green-clad promontory
Is bathed in light perennial and fair.
No sickness there with palsying breath can enter,
To steal the rosy bloom from those we love,

For beauty and eternal health centre
In that bright world above.

Those deeply loved, lamented ones, who perished,
When stricken by the viewless archer's dart,
Whose unforgotten images are cherished
Within the sanctuary of the heart,
Have found a home, a bright, unshadowed dwelling,
Through whose green pathways angels freely rove,
And cherub-choirs their rapturous notes are swelling,
In that bright world above.

And there are pure and living waters bursting
From fountains spotless as unsullied snow,
Waters for which the weary ones are thirsting,
Who sadly linger in this vale below ;
And they, those beatific sons and daughters,
Who swell the anthems of redeeming love,
Were bathed in those clear, purifying waters,
In that bright world above.

When we, who feel the weight of bitter anguish
Attendant on this brief existence here,
Whose spirits from their secret fountains languish
For joys unknown in this imperfect sphere,—
When we shall pass those angel-guarded portals,
And dwell serenely in that land of love,
We then shall join the song of those immortals
In that bright world above.

EDGAR.

BEAUTIFUL SELECTIONS.

It will be remembered that we gave in a late No., a notice of a volume of sermons by Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood, of King's Chapel, Boston. We propose to justify our opinion therein expressed by some extracts, as the volume will not probably be very extensively circulated among our readers. We are sure that the space occupied by the selections will be deemed well filled, and that more than one reading will be given to them by all who love to view in literature, 'Apples of gold in pictures of silver.'

The first extract we give from this elegant volume, is from sermon fourth:—

'GOD THE GUARDIAN OF SOULS.'

'The Supreme Spirit speaks of the spirits which he has created. The Maker declares himself concerning the intelligent beings whom he has made. He claims his right in them, and over them, as his own. He is anxious to gain their attention to this claim; not that it can be resisted, but because it is full of the most solemn conclusions, and he would have it felt and pondered, and not neglected. Therefore he calls to us, that our ears may be opened and our hearts awakened. He says, "Behold!"—"Behold!" says the Almighty Father to his children, "all souls are mine."

'This voice of God in revelation, is not the only one by which his claim to our souls is preferred. Our own convictions, when we contemplate the vast and momentous subject, confirm in deep solemnity the revealed word, and show to us with irresistible proof, that we belong not to ourselves, but to one who made us, and who alone searches and knows us. The sense of our own weakness, the sense of our own ignorance, has each a voice, which tells us of an ownership above us. And consciousness, which makes known to us the power and liberty which we have, mark out to us the bounds within which that power and liberty are confined, and intimates to us by some of the most striking signs of our being and condition, how entirely dependant we are on a will which we cannot control, and on designs and determinations which we cannot fathom.

'Let any one turn his thoughts inward, and think of that mysterious essence within him which thinks; let him meditate upon the soul which he calls his own; and let him say how far it is his own. It is his own in some respects, but in no respect which implies supreme and absolute possession. It is his own to vindicate against the undue influence and authority of all human beings and all earthly things. It is his own to keep from defilement; to guard from the entrance of sin; to cultivate and improve by the use of privileges and the application of circumstances; to bring into a willing subjection to the Father of spirits, conformity with his purposes, and imitation of his perfections; to prepare, through the mercy and help of God, for its happy reception into the heavenly world which is promised. In these respects, and they are important ones, his soul belongs to himself. But these imply no independent authority, no self-derived and original dominion. They imply a trust only, to be fulfilled or neglected, to be used or abused. The power and the liberty go no further. The soul of that man is his own in trust. He holds, that is to say, himself in trust, and by no power of his own. He feels that his whole being is dependant on some other being, which being can only be the Self-Existent. He feels that the possession of himself is not in himself; that he is not his own, but God's.'

'All souls are in the hand of their Keeper and Defender. Not one is excepted. God preserves the roaming, irresponsible soul, through all its aberrations, and, notwithstanding the outward signs of loss, saves all its faculties, and permits not a fraction of its integrity to be dissolved. Of this truth he often affords us the most convincing proofs. Often does the soul, which has been untuned for years, utter in the last moments of mortality, the clear notes of restoration and praise. Often does the soul, which, for a melancholy time has seemed to be shattered, broken down and undone, rise up just as it is called to quit the infirm body, rise up in the wholeness and freshness of former days, show how safely it has been led, and held by the Almighty arm, and then resign itself to its God. So manifestly does the Father of spirits vindicate the truth of his declaration, "All souls are mine." They cannot stray from under his eye; they cannot be lost from his care.

'You will perceive that what I have said of the soul's ignorance of itself, and weakness in and by itself, clashes not at all with what may be urged concerning its high powers, and the intimations which it gives of higher destinies. The views of its infirmity on the one hand, and of its dignity on the other, are religious views, pointing to the same great result. Its hopes, its longings, its workings, its capacity of improvement, its generous affections, these show that it is, and that it is worthy to be cared for; while the want of all knowledge of its essential self, the changes which come over it in spite of itself, its wanderings, as it were, away from itself, all show the necessity of its being cared for by some one who is greater than itself. My main design has been to prove that the wants of the soul direct it to a Maker and Preserver. I have presented one illustration of the old position, "I am, and therefore God must be." Not that God's existence is dependant on ours—God forbid the vain imagination—but that our existence is dependant on his, and denotes his, as that on which it must depend. In this manner is exposed the fallacy of those who pretend to say, that because they are ignorant of the soul's essence, therefore it does not exist. The answer is, that consciousness attests its existence, and its very ignorance of its own essence attests its God. I know not myself—and therefore there must be one who knows me. I cannot sustain myself—and therefore there must be One who sustains me. Give your thoughts intently, my friends, at any time to this subject, and you will feel, with an energy to which words can do no justice, that you are depending, resting, every instant, upon your Maker, your God.

"Behold!" says the Eternal, "all souls are mine." "Yea!" respond our souls, from the deep places of their ignorance, and with all the voices of their wants—"Yea! all souls are thine!" Thou art their Father, Owner, Keeper. The souls of the lofty and the lowly, of the wealthy and the poor, of the happy and the sorrowful—all souls are thine. In the feebleness of childhood, and the feebleness of age; in clouds and darkness, and weariness; from the first moment of their existence, to the last of their sojourn in clay; in their searchings after thee, and departures from thee, and whether they know thee or know thee not, all souls are thine! Take them—they are surrendered to thee! Help their weakness, heal their sickness, enlighten their blindness. Keep them in the knowledge and love of thee, and of thy Son. Let them live in thy countenance, and grow in thy grace, and find thy redeeming mercy. And raise them at last, O, our God, from these poor houses, to those heavenly courts, where they shall know and love thee more, and serve and enjoy thee for ever!"

'DEATH AN APPOINTMENT.'

'And it is in this view of death only, as a divine appointment, that comfort is to be found, when the shadow of death is passing over us. For if God has taken this event into his immediate charge, if death be of his appointing, then we may certainly know, that whatever may be the terrors of its appearance, it is appointed in wisdom, and appointed in love. It is appointed by the same Being who opens our eyes upon the glories of this marvellous world, and is the author of all the happiness we have ever enjoyed. It is appointed by the same Being who rules the universe, in all its movements, and throughout all its extent. Let it come, then, at whatever season, in whatever mode, it cannot come without the cognizance of that knowledge which precludes the supposition of error, and of that mercy on which every doubt and every sorrow may lean. The circumstances of death may indeed be varied by that imprudence which is a part of human frailty, or that perverseness which is a consequence of human liberty. But neither human ignorance nor sin can fatally interfere with the wisdom and love of God. The event of death is unalterably of his appointment, equally with his kindest and brightest dispensations, and being so, cannot be separated from those attendant comforts which flow from his grace, and are founded on his divine nature and attributes. Nor can any shock of the excited elements, or any thing called fatal accident, disturb the settled pillars of this faith. All these are under his control, pass not a step beyond his decree, and touch not the great issue. The wildest waves sink down with the subsiding storm, and yield a path to following navies. The fiercest volcano retires, when spent, into its caverns, and leaves a soil for the richest vineyards on the highway of its desolations. Life follows death, and death life, and both by the same appointment. To know that God is wise, to know that God is good, is to know that his wisdom and his goodness preside at once over life and over death.

'We soon reach the conclusion that the event of death is a direct appointment of the Supreme Intelligence, and that it therefore admits freely of those comforts which a consideration of the attributes of our heavenly Father cannot fail to afford. But we are permitted to proceed somewhat further, and to ask more particularly why is death appointed, and what are the special grounds of the appointment? A complete answer to this question, satisfying every wish of the heart and every difficulty of the understanding, must not be expected in this present state, which is emphatically a state of dimness. But full enough may be answered for the encouragement of patience, of hope, and of unbounded trust.

'All the arrangements of man's present life have an evident temporary character, and a reference to a speedy termination; manifesting the want of things not now attainable, and a series of preparations for some contemplated change. The body itself, the abode of the individual man, is not a structure built up for permanence. The very food by which it is nourished, often becomes the means of its injury or destruction. The slightest attack shakes it. Invisible atoms in the air accomplish its decay. If it escapes all violence, all disease, it wears out of itself, according to the laws of its construction, and with no means of repair. Bounds are set to our knowledge, and to our spiritual experience. The thousands of stars just show themselves to us, and only by night, and in the least appreciable degree, and never draw any nearer, but remain as far away at our maturity as at our birth. Of life, and its principal conditions and essential relations, we soon learn all that there is to be learned. The details of knowledge are indeed inexhaustible, and always enough for occupation, and are only too much neglected; but they are all contained within an earthly circle, and make no addition to those conditions and relations of which I speak. The man who numbers thirty or forty years of pilgrimage, must feel, that with regard to these main objects, he has got through, and that the rest of his way can be only repetition. Our faculties themselves have their limits, beyond which there is no increase for them; just as the body, when arrived at its full strength, grows no stronger. Here are indications of sufficient distinctness to show that there is only so much to be done in this life, so much to be known, so much to be experienced, and no more. And yet, together with these indications, there is an irrepressible desire in the bosom of man, who is thus limited and hemmed in, for the further expansion and progress which the terms of his present being deny to him. Death is appointed to fulfill this desire, by removing the limits and restrictions which the initiatory state of existence imposes. To perceive the temporary nature, and frailty, and deficiency of mortal life, is to perceive a reason for the appointment of death.

'Again, let us consider that the field of this life is full of the springs of sorrow, and that these springs, or a large proportion of them, have their origin in the conditions of its imperfection. The pains and sicknesses of the body, the infirmities and errors of the mind, the wanderings and excesses of the passions, are all the sources of many and great sorrows, and of sins, which are sorrows also. But these sources of sorrow belong to the limited condition of life, and will stop when that condition ends. Their purpose is no doubt disciplinary and useful; but it is consoling to be assured that they will be brought to a close, by the closing of that temporary arrangement from which they arise, and to which they are bound. Death is appointed, then, to hush these sorrows, in the act of terminating this arrangement; and it is appointed to act, not by extinction, but by change; not by putting an end to being itself, and consequently all that belongs to it, but by putting an end to a limited state of being, and all the troubles which are inseparable from its limitations.

'But death itself, which is appointed to cut off the sources of many sorrows, is it not, in the execution of this office, the author of other and overwhelming sorrows? The sobs and tears of widows and orphans, and those of other name among the bereaved, answer without a word, and testify most forcibly that it is. The dear affections which grow out of the consanguinities and connections of domestic life, must needs be wounded when those relations are broken by death. To love here on earth, is indeed to prepare the way for sorrow, for all who love must be parted by the great appointment. But death is appointed to put an end also to this sorrow. It is appointed to put an end to that state which requires death. Its first, last and only act, is to open a scene of things in which its own power is forever abdicated. Years will roll on, and there will be no symptoms of old age or decay; centuries will elapse, and there will be no fear, no thought of dying; for they who have died once, shall die no more, death having no place nor part in the dominion to which he has brought them. What a scene of enlargement and advancement is that, in which there will be no decline of the faculties, no walls for their imprisonment, no chains binding them to the set rounds of mortality. What a scene of holiness, in which those causes of sin shall cease, which now operate through the infirmities of the flesh. What a scene of happiness, in which those sources of sorrow must necessarily be dried up, which now flow from sickness, from separation, from death. We die once, and but once. Death was appointed, that it might be lost in life.'

'CONSOLATIONS OF RELIGION.'

'If we begin with the first steps and principles of our religion, we shall perceive comfort and consolation broadly and intelligibly marked upon them all. Contemplate the divine attributes; contemplate them one by one. How strongly does each impress the mind with the sentiment of relief and support!

'With what magnificent assurance of protection does the idea of God's Almighty visit the soul, making it certain, beyond suspicion or doubt, that in all its weaknesses and faintings it will be upheld and sustained by that unfailing arm, which upholds and sustains the illimitable creation.

'How does the attribute of Omnipresence encircle us about with safe conduct and guardianship, as with an unassailable host of heavenly angels. How does it encompass us on every side, as with a seven-fold shield, at home or in foreign climes, on sea or land, by night and day. It cannot forsake, though all else forsake us; it cannot remove, though the earth be removed. It is with us everywhere, more enveloping than the overarching sky, nearer than the vital air. Who is alone, when God is with him? And where can any one be, where God is not? "Thou compasses my path and my lying down;" "thou hast beset me behind and before." Is there not consolation in this surrounding presence, this impregnable defence, this unalienable protection, this watchfulness without fatigue, this adherence without desertion or change, this shadow without darkness, the sheltering and nursing shadow of the Almighty's wings? Does not peace and a confiding sense of security settle down on our comforted hearts, however desponding or afflicted they may have been, when we repeat those trusting words of the Psalmist, "As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people, from henceforth, even for ever?"

"From henceforth, even for ever." Yet further treasures of comfort are contained in those last words, which speak of God's eternity. That power which now supports, will still support us; that presence which now surrounds and guards, will still surround and guard us. Consoling indeed it is to think, that amidst all which changes, decays and dies around us, that which is our chief dependance is immutable and immortal, not to be affected by time, nor to be disturbed by adversity.

'Then there is the attribute of God's omniscience. Great is the consolation to be derived from the thought of that wisdom to which nothing within the bounds of possibility is unknown; which though it often appoints that which afflicts us, always ordains that which is best for us, and can never be mistaken with regard to what we really require, however our own wishes and plans may be contradicted and disappointed.

'What is the justice of God, but our resort and redress, and the clear, interior light of his throne, even when it is shrouded to our eyes with thickest clouds and darkness? What is it but an assurance that no lasting wrong shall be done, or suffered to be done to us; that our griefs shall have their balance and their recompense; that all seeming inequalities shall finally be smoothed away from the path of Divine Providence, and that no real injuries shall befall us, except those which we inflict upon ourselves.

'The attribute of God's loving mercy and kindness, is all consolation. It tells us of a Being who has nothing harsh or vindictive in his character; who is always tender and compassionate toward us, though never weakly and injudiciously so; who pities us as a father pities his children, and loves even when he chastens us, and chastens because he loves us.

'How can the heart fail to be strengthened, and refuse to be comforted, when thus it may repose itself, with all its sorrows, burthens and incapacities, on infinity, on perfection, on the immutable Rock of eternal ages? Are we sufficiently accustomed to contemplate the divine attributes in this their light of consolation? Should we not attend more to this conspicuous and most adorable characteristic of the whole nature of God? And if we did, should we not bear with a more resigned and contented spirit, not only the great afflictions of life, but the minor troubles and crosses of our condition? Should we not perform our allotted parts more patiently and cheerfully, if we impressed upon our minds such an habitual perception of the Supreme Being, that every feature and mystery of his nature should look down upon us at all times with the expression of benignity, protection and consolation.

'But consoling as are these views of the attributes of God, Jesus Christ has afforded us yet more comfort by the manner in which he has revealed to us the Father. No one can read the Gospels with attention, without being struck by the close and endearing affinity which is manifested there between the Creator and his creatures. The interest which the Great Supreme is represented as taking in us, may be called, if it be not too familiar to call it so, strict and personal. Our Savior does not so much give us general views of the nature of God, as he brings the attributes into immediate contact with ourselves and our fortunes. We behold a God and a Father, who not only supports us, together with the rest of his creation, and provides for us by that wisdom and goodness which are the life and joy of the universe, but who, though the whole globe which we inhabit is but a speck among his works, and we ourselves are so inconstant and frail, actually sets a value upon us, and draws himself as near to each individual soul, as if that one soul were the one object of his devoted care, and there was nothing else to share his attention. Are ye not of more value than many sparrows? Yet not one of them falleth to the ground without the knowledge of your Father. The very hairs of your head are all numbered. Expressions of this kind occur so frequently in the Gospels, that they throw a peculiar air of tenderness over them, and cause them to express a particularity of regard in the dealings of God with men, which is one of the most remarkable characteristics of those sacred histories, as it is of the whole Christian scheme. God is represented throughout as our friend; mighty and glorious as in the pictures drawn by the Jewish lawgiver, and the prophets of the old dispensation, but still as our friend, our nearest and best friend.

'With these sources of Christian consolation, is connected, and I may say necessarily connected, the Christian doctrine of our immortality. This doctrine is established by deduction from the revealed nature of the Deity, and by the express declarations, confirmed by the actual resurrection, of our Lord Jesus Christ. If any thing be true in Christianity, this is true; and it completes those consolations of religion, which, without it, would be incomplete, faint and ineffectual. Not much comfort in sorrow would be derived even from a conviction of the constant watchfulness and immediate presence and protection of God, if we could be left to suppose that death wrested us from his guardianship, and put a dark and final close to our connection with his spirit. But after what Christianity taught us of the Creator, we may venture to say it was impossible that ~~it~~ should not have also taught the immortality of his intelligent creatures. It does teach with perfect distinctness that glorious, and, as we may call it, finishing truth, that the existence of man will be commensurate with the existence of God; that the love and the truth and protection which the great Father now exercises toward his children, will lead them through the gate of death; and that the communion which he now holds with them, intimate as it is, will be yet more close and sensible, when the Lamb shall walk with their refined and beatified spirits through the bowers of an eternal Eden, and the golden streets of the heavenly Jerusalem. This is giving the seal of eternity to all that is compassionate and soothing and exalting in our knowledge of God. This is the key-stone, which locks and binds together the grand arch of Christian consolation. When our tears are flowing in calamity, they cease to flow, or flow on without bitterness, when we lift our eyes to that eternal state where they shall all be wiped away. We resign our friends, with hope and comfort in our mourning, because we know that they are not dead but sleeping, and as safe in the arms of God as when they retired to rest on earth, after the labors of the day—perhaps more safe, for passion is hushed, and temptation is over. In all our troubles we shall regard not only the wisdom and kindness of their purpose, but the brevity of their duration, and with the apostle Paul, “reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us.”

‘There is much in that evening scene between Jerusalem and Emmaus, which we may profitably apply to our own hearts. Whenever the day is far spent, and the evening is coming on, we may join those two disciples in spirit, and adopt their words, and ask the Savior of men to abide with us.

‘1. And first, we may express this desire for the Savior’s companionship, at the time of the natural evening. At that calm and holy time, when the sounds of the world’s business are ceasing, one after another, and the air is growing still, and our souls are insensibly disposed to harmonize with the time, and also to become quiet and still, whose company may we more fitly seek, than that of the meek, peaceful and sinless Jesus? During the day, it may be, while the sun was climbing up the sky, and the race and contest of worldly pursuits and competitions were going vigorously on, our thoughts have been hurried into the midst of them, and in that turmoil have been excited and vexed, bewildered, and then fatigued even to exhaustion. But when the sun declines, and the fever of the strife is passing off, our thoughts are inclined to leave the crowd, and enter into more green and solitary ways, that they may have a season of recovery and rest. Then it is that the Savior, who is always ready to meet sober and prepared hearts, may join us, and walk with us, and then it is that we may induce him to abide with us. For the Master may abide with disciples even now, though not in the body, yet essentially, and as effectually as ever, in the influences which proceed from his life and character, and which join themselves to the souls which invite them. He abides with us, when the model of his example is near to us, and points out to us our duty. He abides with us, when the thought of his love toward us, and his sufferings undergone for us, comes with power to our hearts, causing them to burn within us. He abides with us, when his own spirit dwells with us; when we feel that we sympathize with him in those pious sentiments which filled his breast, and those benevolent purposes which guided his course on earth; when we enjoy the contemplation of his holiness, and are sure that we are made better by the contemplation. Thus it is that he abides with us. And how can we receive into our affections a more profitable guest? When the day is far spent, who, as he, can speak to us on the most wise and gainful use of our fleeting hours? Who, as he, can teach us to improve our daily opportunities, to dispose of our daily cares, to discern between the innocent and the hurtful, the true and the false, the right and the wrong? Certainly there is no one who can discharge as he can the office of instructor and friend, and prepare us by evening admonitions for morning watchfulness and daily work. Seriously and kindly he will inquire of us what we have done during the past day. If we have done ill, he will move us to repentance; if we have done well, he will crown us with his approbation. If we have done nothing, but have been standing all the day idle, he will incite us by all those motives which are most prevalent with the better nature, to redouble our diligence for the days which may remain to us, in order that we may, as far as possible, repair our loss.

‘Let us call to mind some of the characters and accompaniments of the natural evening, and mark how the presence of Christ and his religion harmonizes with them, and exalts them.

‘Peace comes with evening. It is a gentle and a soothing season. But the peace of Christ abiding with us, will make it yet more peaceful; because it is the answer of the internal to the external; the quietness of the bosom rendering more profound and grateful the quietness of the atmosphere, of the land, and of the ocean; and because it alone can give security against the fears of darkness, the disturbances and alarms of night. It is a peace which corrects all that harshness of our humanity, which is apt to disturb with its dissonance the repose of nature, or render us impenetrable to its influences.

'The soft, broad shadows come with evening. They close round us as if they would envelop and shade the spirit, too much heated and wearied before, giving it time for restoration. But how much safer and more quiet is the spirit, if by the side of the Son of God, it claims a higher protection, and takes refuge under the shadow of the Almighty.

'The dews come with evening. They gather coolly on the drooping leaves, and stand in refreshing drops on all the panting flower cups, and on every blade of grass; but it is only the Christian, only he who places his hope in Christ, and with whom Christ is abiding, who can tell with what a reviving efficacy the dews of heavenly grace fall down upon the drooping soul.

'The bright stars come out with evening. Splendidly they shine, and solemnly, those mighty orbs—so far away that every beam from them, with all its swiftness, has required years for its journey hither;—but with a more intelligent brightness will they shine, if Christ be with us, to lead our adoring thoughts to the Almighty Father who feeds them with their light, and has prepared a place yet more elevated and more glorious than theirs, in which his redeemed children shall dwell with him for ever.

'Sleep comes with evening. But let us not lie down, as do the flocks and herds in the fields, without a prayer to him who sends us slumber; for we are capable of religion, and they are not. Sweetly will sleep fall upon our eyelids, if we have been holding communion with our Savior in heavenly-mindedness, and, as if we heard from him the words of kind permission, "sleep on now, and take your rest," we can commend ourselves in confidence to the Watchman of Israel.

'2. The day which was far spent when the two disciples stopped at Emmaus, was the day of our Lord's resurrection. It was the first Christian Sabbath; the first Lord's Day. The associations which belong to that day, and the sacred observances to which it has been devoted, have made it the weekly Sabbath of Christians. Sabbath is rest. For its rest, for its silence, for its holiness, the Sabbath may be likened to the evening. It is the evening of the week. At this season, then, so especially consecrated to the Savior, he may especially abide with us. Indeed we would meet him every day, and every evening we would ask him to abide with us; but on this evening of the week, his abiding with us may be more than usually confidential and uninterrupted. Who shall interrupt it with the noises of the world? To break in upon the devotion of the Lord's Sabbath, and upon the repose which is connected with that devotion, with no plea but one's indifference or one's fancy, is as barbarous a thing, and as offensive to right feeling, as if the rude and hasty sounds of business were to be wakened up at nightfall, to rend and break asunder the calmness of eventide, and tramp and rattle through the offended darkness. One profanation is as great as the other. Let the evening of the week, as the evening of the day, be preserved in quietness, that we may commune with the Lord of this Sabbath, and he may expound to us the Scriptures, and abide with us in peace.'

"Abide with me from morn till eve,
For without thee I cannot live;
Abide with me when death is nigh,
For without thee I dare not die!"

SABBATH HYMN.

BY IONE.

HARK! hark! for the Sabbath bells
Are pealing out on the morning air;
And their music falls and swells,
On the listening ear like a chanted prayer,
Bidding the faithful and good prepare
For the worship of God in his temple fair!

Canst thou turn from earth away,
And go with a spirit all prepared,
To walk in the holy way,
And drink from the fountain a Savior shared,
While his gentle head to the storm he bared,
And his heart was wrung as its frown he dared!

List, list to the peaceful chime!
The portals are open, arise and go
In the flush of morning's prime
With thoughtful brow to the house below,
While calmly we worship the God we know,
Nor bow unto idols in fear and wo!

Join, join in the music's swell!
Perchance the angels repeat the song
In the mansions where they dwell!
Shouldst thou from their presence linger long
In faith and hope shall thy soul be strong
To see the home where the good belong!

We shall need no Sabbath bell
In the spirit-land to win the soul
To the worship loved so well!
But there, while unending ages roll,
Shall the harps be tuned to the soft control
Of the loving and loved who have reached the goal!

FEAR. Never let fear get the mastery over your mind; assert courage, and thou shalt conquer. PR.

MORAL REVENGE.

BY HENRY BACON.

2 Cor. vii. 11: 'Yea, what Revenge!'

THE Apostle treats of true repentance in the context, and aims to set forth the good effects of the conquering spirit of aspiring after that which is really and permanently good. He presents seven particulars in describing the efficacy of godly repentance, or repentance which springs from ardent longing for true godliness, which particulars show us that repentance is not a mere work of feeling unassociated with vigorous effort to realize in the life what is felt in the soul. He declares that sorrow 'after a godly sort' works first carefulness to guard against any want of application to the duties enjoined by remembrance of past transgressions; then a clearing of the heart from all the coils of temptation and insidious, evil desires and fancies; then indignation that the soul should have yielded itself to the sins which beset and enticed it in the past; then fear lest it be so entrapped again and led astray; then vehement desire after more and more of the true divine life and victorious energy of faith; then zeal to obtain what is desired and longed after; and then the whole summed up in one passion—Revenge—revenge visited upon all the foes of progress—all the enemies of true godliness. Hence the Apostle adds,—'In all things ye have approved yourselves to be clear in this matter.'

Revenge is always classed with the baser passions. It is always described as the fury of the soul bent on some work that promises no good; and every picture that rises to our imagination as portraying Revenge, is fearfully repulsive. We see before us a being swelling with rage, like one of Shakspeare's character, with sword uplifted from which the blood of a murdered man drops in awful rain, while the infuriated being cries—

'See how my sword weeps for the poor king's death.
O may such purple tears be always shed
From those that wish the downfall of our house!
If any spark of life be yet remaining,
Down, down to hell; and say—I sent thee thither,
I that have neither pity, love, nor fear.'

Revenge that has affinity to that passion is opposed entirely to the christian spirit, and promises no good. Great souls know it not. Brave hearts despise it. All noble beings shun it, for all the destruction and conquest they can desire is that which builds them up in the nobility of human nature while it destroys the enemy by changing them into friends.

This is the revenge to which the Apostle alluded when he said, 'Yea, what Revenge!' He did not mean that the workings of Repentance made those to whom he wrote revengeful, in the common acceptation of the term, towards their enemies—towards those who had impeded their usefulness, and fed the feelings which perplex and morally enfeeble. No! his exclamation 'Yea, what Revenge!' was born of loftier emotions than were ever excited by beholding fierce wrath and seeing the ruin it had wrought. He justified no one in returning evil for evil; but earnestly enjoined the overcoming all evil by the good which can be awakened and nourished in the soul.

For an illustration we may refer to an incident in the life of one of the most remarkable of ancient sculptors. He had wrought out a splendid statue for a certain people, and the exquisiteness of the workmanship attracted to the city it adorned multitudes of admirers of the fine Arts. It was acknowledged to be the wonder of the world, and the people prided themselves on its possession. But by certain acts they wronged the Artist, and he felt himself abused by the insidious manner in which they had affected his reputation. The spirit of revenge was awakened—it burned for awhile—it dictated first an attempt to destroy the work he had wrought and abandoning the city; but soon the feeling took another turn—he mingled in a little of the philosophic element and he became more calm. He immediately designed a work, and put himself to its execution, that should far surpass the other, and when he should finish it, he resolved that it should be given to another people. He wrought the work. It stood before the eye a wonderful production of Genius. It far surpassed the other; and the world's admiration—the admiration of those who could appreciate the beautiful, was turned away from the city that had wronged him. As he viewed how he had surpassed himself, he felt proud, and when others talked of the origin of the splendid work, they could not but exclaim—'What Revenge!'

This has an eloquent meaning when morally applied. If sin wrongs us—if the gossiping world deals in its falsehoods and half truths to our disadvantage—if our religious opposers belie us as a denomination, let us seek to work out some excellence of principle, of disposition, of character, of example and influence, which will exhibit a noble revenge and turn away the ear and the eye from the detractor.

This is the only good use which we can make of detraction. If we listen to it only to mourn over it—to indignantly repel it, and to offer what we may call a manly return, we shall only in our earnestness and perhaps, excess of feeling or passion, give more food to the gossip bird and strengthen his wings for more daring flights. Fretfulness, more than any thing else, weakens the energy of mind. A slight framed pugilist will become the victor over a giant by his art at fretting the strong man; and so has the race been won by a horse of inferior speed. Expressly do the Scriptures guard us against this weakener, as they exhort the faithful—'Fret not thyself because of evil-doers.' 'Fret not thyself because of him who prospereth in his way, because of the man who bringeth wicked devices to pass.' 'Fret not thyself in any wise to do evil.' Had the Artist to whom we have alluded permitted the evils with which he had to contend to fret him, he never would have had that noble revenge which he did have. He made the evils to be incentives to higher exertions—to awaken new excellence of effort, and bring out more of the ideal loveliness and grace that gladdened his soul. He thereby wasted no time, but made the strength that otherwise would have been lost, conduce to the embodiment of something permanently good which would win its way to the love of beauty in the heart, despite all effort against it. This was the spirit of him who declared—

'My sufferings shall
Erect a prouder trophy to my name,
Than all my prosperous actions.'

This is the only spirit which will repair the loss—this only will keep alive christian feeling and promote christian activity, while it gives revenge. This is Moral Revenge. He who scorns it and deems it too tame for him, will have a shadow in his dreams, a worm continually gnawing at his heart, an uneasiness forever disturbing all that would promote peace. He feels the sting which he would make another feel; and while he writhes in the anguish he would hide, he declares it 'manlike to revenge,' and is answered, 'Yes, but it is godlike to forgive.'

The practice of Forgiveness is essential to Moral Revenge. It is a difficult virtue, but nothing so strengthens the soul as efforts to practice it. It is necessary to that self-possession which gives the soul the use of all its powers and enables it to act calmly, earnestly, and successfully. Thus acting, we overcome evil with good, and manifest that in us is the spirit of him who revealed as the glory of the Father the reconciling of the world—all things, to himself. We cannot do otherwise without carrying out the spirit of popular representations of the Deity, and acting in our own behalf the Revenge of the 'Judgment.' Let us so look upon the beauties and glories of the Divine Government in overcoming evil with good, as that we may indulge no revenge which is incompatible with true goodness and progress.

'BOZ' AT NIAGARA.

PRESUMING that many will love to read over and over again Dickens' record of his thoughts and feelings at Niagara, we give it place here. He is the only writer who describes the effect such as we imagine ought to be made on a christian's mind by the sight. Too many receive nothing but an impression of Power or Terror, whereas the glory there revealed ought to sound the Infinite within as deep as thoughts of the Sublime and Beautiful can go. We pant at this moment for such a sight—this moment when unavoidable evils have produced inward tumult over which Mind must hold a sovereignty and work—work!

'It was a miserable day; chilly and raw; a damp mist falling; and the trees in that northern region quite bare and wintry. Whenever the train halted, I listened for the roar; and was constantly straining my eyes in the direction where I knew the Falls must be, from seeing the river rolling on towards them; every moment expecting to behold the spray. Within a few minutes of our stopping, not before, I saw two great white clouds rising up slowly and majestically from the depths of the earth. That was all. At length we alighted; and then for the first time, I heard the mighty rush of water, and felt the ground tremble underneath my feet.

'The bank is very steep, and was slippery with rain, and half-melted ice. I hardly know how I got down, but I was soon at the bottom and climbing, with two English officers who were crossing and had joined me, over some broken rocks, deafened by the noise, half-blinded by the spray, and wet to the skin. We were at the foot of the American Fall. I could see an immense torrent of water tearing headlong down from some great height, but had no idea of shape, or situation, or any thing but vague immensity.

'When we were seated in the little ferry-boat, and were crossing the swollen river before both cataracts, I began to feel what it was; but I was in a manner stunned, and unable to comprehend the vastness of the scene. It was not until I came on Table Rock, and looked—Great Heaven, on what a fall of bright-green water!—that it came upon me in its full might and majesty.

'Then, when I felt how near to my Creator I was standing, the first effect, and the enduring one—instant and lasting—of the tremendous spectacle, was Peace. Peace of Mind; Tranquillity; Calm recollections of the Dead; Great Thoughts of Eternal Rest and Happiness; nothing of Gloom or Terror. Niagara was at once stamped upon my heart, an Image of Beauty; to remain there changeless and indelible, until its pulses cease to beat, for ever.

'Oh, how the strife and trouble of our daily life receded from my view, and lessened in the distance, during the ten memorable days we passed on that Enchanted Ground! What voices spoke from out the thundering water; what faces, faded from the earth, looked out upon me from its gleaming depths; what Heavenly promise glistened in those angels' tears, the drops of many hues, that showered around, and twined themselves about the gorgeous arches which the changing rainbows made!

'I never stirred in all that time from the Canadian side whither I had gone at first. I never crossed the river again; for I knew there were people on the other shore, and in such a place it is natural to shun strange company. To wander to and fro all day, and see the cataracts from all points of view; to stand upon the edge of the Great Horse Shoe Fall, marking the hurried water gathering strength as it approached the verge, yet seeming, too, to pause before it shot into the gulf below; to gaze from the river's level up at the torrent as it came streaming down; to climb the neighboring heights and watch it through the trees, and see the wreathing water in the rapids hurrying on to take its fearful plunge; to linger in the shadow of the solemn rocks three miles below; watching the river as, stirred by no visible cause, it heaved and eddied and awoke the echoes, being troubled yet, far down beneath the surface, by its giant leap; to have Niagara before me, lighted by the sun and by the moon, red in the day's decline, and gray as evening slowly fell upon it; to look upon it every day, and wake up in the night and hear its ceaseless voice; this was enough.

'I think in every quiet season now, still do those waters roll and leap, and roar and tumble, all day long; still are the rainbows spanning them, a hundred feet below. Still, when the sun is on them, do they shine and glow like molten gold. Still, when the day is gloomy, do they fall like snow, or seem to crumble away like the front of a great chalk cliff, or roll adown the rock like dense white smoke. But always does the mighty stream appear to die as it comes down, and always from its unfathomable grave arises that tremendous ghost of spray and mist which is never laid; which has haunted this place with the same dread solemnity since Darkness brooded on the deep, and that first flood before the Deluge—Light—came rushing on Creation at the word of God.'

HAGER AND HER SON IN THE WILDERNESS.

BY MRS. N. THORNING MUNROE.

'She said let me not see the death of the child.'

GEN. xxi. 16.

SHE could not see him die,
She could not stand beside her cherished one,
She could not gaze into his upturned eye,
And calmly say, Father thy will be done!

Gently she laid him there
Beneath a desert shrub, and looked again
Upon his marble brow, and clustering hair,
And kissed his dry parched lips,—but all in vain!

It was a bitter hour!
The one whom she had cherished as her breath,
Lay there before her like a stricken flower,
His young form struggling in the grasp of Death!

Sadly she turned away;
She could not watch his glazed and closing eye;
She turned aside that she might weep and pray,
For O, great God, she could not see him die.

VOL. XI.

The past rose like a dream,
She saw her boy, her beautiful, her own,
She felt his presence like a joyous gleam,
She listened, and she heard a low, deep moan.

And then she knew the worst,
She knew that he was dying in the wild,
With nought to quench his fierce and raging thirst,
O God, was there no water for her child?

God heard that mother's prayer,
And then upon her strained and listening ear,
Fell the sweet sound of water gushing there!
How leaped her heart that welcome sound to hear.

And O he would not die,
She wet his lips, and bathed his clustering hair,
Until the child looked up with earnest eye,
And his glad laugh rang out upon the air.

THE EXCELLENT LOVING KINDNESS OF GOD.

PSALMS xxxvi. 7: 'How excellent is thy loving kindness, O God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings.'

THE excellent loving kindness of God was a theme ever congenial to the warm feelings and high aspirations of the Psalmist's soul. He delighted to dwell on it—to sound it forth in anthem and song, and to rejoice in its gladdening influences, yea, and with more enthusiasm than the child revels in the smiles and caresses of its mother, or the artist in contemplating the works of genius and skill, or the philosopher in exploring the nice mysteries of nature in mind and matter. No object could awaken in a mortal breast purer delight, or more elevated emotions, than were awakened in the heart of the Psalmist by meditations on the loving kindness of the Almighty, and he seemed to find new beauties and glories the more he dwelt on the theme, and he limited not the ever enduring blessings of that kindness to less than the whole intelligent creation.

The rational enthusiasm of the Psalmist was the result of elevated views of God. To him the goodness of God was not a mere desire in the Divine Being to do men good, but it was an ever active principle, diffusing abroad numerous blessings, and ever executing good for man. Mark how he speaks of the Almighty's goodness—he calls it loving kindness, which is a most endearing phrase, and brings to our mind, irresistibly, ideas of a most tender, forbearing, and generous spirit. We spurn from us the thought that he can possess endless wrath, we rejoice in his paternal goodness, and feel how excellent is his loving kindness!

The text contains a sentiment that has been too much hidden by traditions in the religious world, and men have acted as though the truth were the reverse.

It declares in substance, that according to a man's conception of the loving kindness of God, will be his trust in him. This certainly is the argument of the words, 'How excellent is thy loving kindness, O God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings.'

Religious teachers have thought differently from this. They have imagined that according as a man feared the terror of God's wrath, would be his inclination to turn to and trust in the Lord. Hence they have sought more to awaken an horrible dread, than the warm and powerful emotions of filial love; and man has been more threatened than he has been invited by gentle means. But the royal poet has declared the better way; he says that because the loving kindness of the Almighty is excellent, men put their trust in him; and give man but a clear conception of God's kindness—let him but view in its proper light the protective goodness of the Father of spirits, and let him but know how this tenderness of the Almighty tends to him individually to promote his happiness, and he will put his unreserved trust in God, even as the infant feels that its mother's arms and bosom form a safe retreat from all dangers.

Let us pause a moment to consider the first clause of the text. Though made as an exclamation, it is the declaration of a truth; 'How excellent is thy loving kindness, O God!' or, 'Thy loving kindness is excellent, O God!' And this is all acknowledged; even the advocates of the narrowest sect will declare God's loving kindness to be excellent, and dwell with rapture on the theme. But let us ask ourselves the question, What constitutes the excellent loving kindness of a God? And ere we answer this we inquire, What is God? of whom it is said his loving kindness is excellent. God is the Supreme over worlds and beings; the controller of the destinies of nations and men; the being whose wisdom comprehends a knowledge of all times, seasons, events, relations, dependencies, and persons; and whose power executeth his own sovereign will in all places of his dominion.

God, then, is the creator, sustainer, and controller of man, and if he is kind to man, loving kind, it must be the affection of an unchanging being, and worthy of a God! To be excellently loving kind he must seek or design man's best ultimate good, and hence the author of our text has written that God is good unto all, and his tender mercies, the same as his loving kindness, are over all his works. Here then is what constitutes the LOVING kindness of a God, and nothing less than this can entitle it to the name of excellent.

If God love but a part—if his loving kindness is continued only over a few, in what is his loving kindness excellent? It excels not the loving kindness of man; for instances of human love triumphing unto death to do good to enemies, are on the pages of history, yea, the Lord Jesus Christ were on this ground greater than God—his loving kindness certainly were more excellent. But it is man, and not the Scriptures, that has limited the kindness of God. The Scriptures are abundant in maintaining its universality and everlasting nature. And when they bring what is termed his anger in contrast with his mercy, they declare the one to be as but for a moment, while the other is from everlasting to everlasting.

And this constitutes the excellency of God's loving kindness. It rises above every opposing principle; it seeks the good of man when man ceases to seek his own good; it fails not though vileness may have made the whole heart sick; it goes onward and on triumphing in its work of love and blessedness, giving us fruitful seasons, opening a thousand sources of pleasure, strengthening our hope of immortal joys, and it will continue to bless mankind till vast humanity shall be redeemed from corruption and death, and made equal to the angels.

A love less than this honors not God. Man cannot call it excellent; for to love but a part of those he has power to bless, so far from excelling the love of some philanthropists, actually falls far short of their loving kindness. But no; man cannot excel the love of the Almighty. Even Jesus, in the depth and fullness of his love, did not exceed the kindness of the Father, for he was the image of the Father's love, and by his every act commended God's kindness towards us. Well may we exclaim in the well known lines—

'Could we with ink the ocean fill,
Was all the earth of parchment made,
Was every stick thereon a quill,
And every man a scribe by trade;
To write the love of God to man
Would drain the ocean dry,
Nor would the scroll contain the span
Though stretched from sky to sky.'

It is essential to our mental peace that we have these enlarged conceptions of our Maker's goodness, for otherwise we must entertain fearful apprehensions of all the other attributes of the Deity; and were it not for the universal, impartial, and unalterable goodness of the Almighty, there would be no pleasing thoughts in contemplating the government of the universe; chaos would reign instead of harmony, and mercy bleed where love now rejoices; instead of exercising a filial trust in the Supreme, we should shrink from the thought of him, and instead of exclaiming with David, 'My meditation of Him shall be sweet!' we should rather cry out, My meditation of him would be horror!

Here let us direct our attention to consider three propositions that must be acceded to by our understandings, before we can have a firm trust in the love of God; when we shall feel these propositions to be fully maintained, we can with the Psalmist's zeal exclaim—How excellent is thy loving kindness, O God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings.

1. We must have faith in the reality of the existence of the excellent loving kindness of God. Do we believe that a powerful God exists—that his power upholds and controls the universe? In order to trust him as we ought, we must have the conviction rooted in the mind and heart, that as surely as a God exists, he is a God whose excellent loving kindness is ever active. We must blend this idea with his very existence, and separate them not. As the life of God is love, so the life of a firm faith in him is the persuasion that he is love; but if we follow in the train of many dark minds, and dwell far more on what are called the justice and vengeance of the Almighty than we do on his excellent loving kindness, our faith will be weakened and superstitious fears awakened.

When sometimes we hear men declaim on the terrible wrath of the Deity, we are inclined to the conclusion that they have no abiding conviction of the real existence of God's loving kindness; they speak of it as but a momentary feeling, and make it appear far more certain that God will punish than that he will love us. But the religion of Jesus Christ portrays a far different and lovelier picture. It assures us of the reality of our Maker's kindness towards us, and even marks the punishments of his justice as the operations of that love that seeks the best good of the punished. Proclaim endless misery for a single soul, and you annihilate, in word, thus far the loving kindness of the Deity; man may proclaim till eternity gives back the echo of his words, that God loved that soul once, and man would not believe such a proclamation. What God has once loved he can never hate, and that which he loves he cannot condemn to unchanging and ever enduring woe.

But in order to possess a firm trust in God we must not only have a conviction of the reality of the existence of the excellent loving kindness of God, but, 2d, We must have a conviction that that loving kindness is extended over ourselves and all; and 3d, We must also have the conviction that this excellent loving kindness of our Maker will ever exist the same, in time and eternity.

It avails but little to be convinced that God is actually good; we must feel that he is good to us—to us as members of the great family, and that he will never cease to be good to us, in time, nor eternity. Nor here can we rest easy without advancing; our hearts have treasures dear as our own bliss, and we must feel that God will be eternally good to them also—that he will redeem, purify and gladden them with us, and that when we shall feel our hope of everlasting bliss secure, we can look on those dear to our affections and entertain a lively, yea, a sure hope for them also.

And when we shall have encircled all these in the embrace of divine goodness, we shall find no excuse for excluding others; then rejoicing in the illimitable grace of the Almighty, feeling that a ransomed world will display the glory of his goodness, we are ready in hearty enthusiasm of soul to cry—How excellent is thy loving kindness, O God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings.

It may be deemed poetry, but it is not all poetry, to carry out the expressive figure introduced in the text. The Psalmist speaks of the wings of the Almighty—a very common and proper figure of speech. He speaks of the wings of God's goodness—men put their trust under the shadow of these wings; and may we not say, without being deemed fanciful, that as men trust in the goodness of God for blessings in this life and in that which is to come, the two wings of the excellent loving kindness of the Deity overshadow time and eternity!

This is a pleasing thought—that the wings of Almighty goodness forever and forever overshadow us; that there are no bounds or limits to his protecting love; no power that can bear us away, or deprive us of the rich flowings of excelling kindness; and well may we exclaim with the Apostle—'Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us. For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.'

And why may we not have the same triumphant faith? Why may we not have the same abiding persuasion that life, nor death, nor any thing present, or to come, cannot separate us from the eternal love of the unchangeable Jehovah? We may have this faith—this rooted persuasion, if like Paul we will be content to take Christ for our foundation, and glory only in the hope of eternal life through him from the free grace of God.

While men build on other foundations they can never have this triumphant faith and ever lively hope; they will fear, and will have no comfort to impart to others; but let them glory only in the cross—let them rest only on the purpose of God, and they will be enabled to rejoice in the hope of eternal life promised by the God that cannot lie before the world began. This hope presenting the happiness of purity as the great object of desire and rejoicing, will tend, by its legitimate action to purify the heart unto rejoicing in obedience. 'We are saved by hope.'

REVERIES.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

THEY come! the visions of the Past arise,
A crowd of mingling shadows bright and fair!
There stands the bride with the resplendent eyes—
There sits the maiden with the golden hair!
Vainly, O vainly do I strive to tear
My soul away from these bewildering dreams;
They crowd with glory all the twilight air,—
I see their faces mirrored in the streams,
And meet their gentle smiles in every star that beams!

Now float the orange wreath and bridal veil
Around a brow with youthful beauty bright;
And now that brow, serenely fair and pale,
Lies in the shadow of eternal night.
A rounded arm,—a hand of dazzling white,—
A laughing eye of deep and changeful blue—
These come like gleams of sunshine to my sight,
In every winning guise and radiant hue,
The visions of the Loved, the Beautiful, the True!

I hear a laugh, like music in the wood;
A wild clear gush of rich and happy thought;
It comes from one whose heart was kind and good,
With every gentle charity inwrought.
No drooping soul her sympathy e'er sought
That she did bless not with a pitying tear;
And even Despair in her bright presence caught
Some gleam of faith his gloomy brow to cheer,
Some faint, yet precious hope that Mercy might be near.

Before me rise soft glades of verdant grass,
And dewy glens, o'ercanopied with vines;
Bright murmuring streams and founts before me pass,
With flower-wreathed altars, and lone woodland shrines.
My soul to Memory every power resigns,
And leaves me wandering through her magic halls;
Now by some olden haunt my heart reclines,
Now, turns aside where some wild streamlet falls,
Or in the grave-yard stands, lifting its shadowy palls!

Mid mountain passes, beautiful and wild,
Where beard-like mosses load the giant trees,
I wander with a wayward, dark-eyed child
Of Love and Song, as fearless as the breeze!
With her I catch the murmuring of the bees,
The songs of birds around the brawny cliff;
With her I watch the sunlight on the leas,
Or by the cedar branches, firm and stiff,
Descend the rugged height, and launch the floating skiff.

Clear lies the stream beneath the summer sky,
With little islands on its breast asleep;
Above its waves our fairy bark floats high,
Or slowly winds beneath some frowning steep,
Across whose brow the glossy woodbines creep.
Now by the slant old tree we moor our boat,
And in the bosom of its shadows deep,
Listen, with dreamy spirits, to the note
That swells, with thrilling gush, the oriole's golden throat.

Oh Memory, thou wakener of the Dead!
Thou only treasurer of the vanished Past!
How welcome art thou when bright Hope is fled,
And Sorrow's mantle o'er the soul is cast!
Back o'er those days, too beautiful to last,
Thy gentle hand will lead the saddened thought;
And though the tears may trickle warm and fast,
Yet thy sweet pictures with such peace are fraught,
The heart beguiled, exclaims, 'This is the fount I sought!'

LADY RACHEL RUSSELL.

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

LADY RACHEL RUSSELL, whose misfortunes and excellence, have rendered her still more illustrious than her high rank, was the wife of Lord William Russell, an eminent English patriot, who fell a victim to the jealousy and fears of Charles the Second, and was beheaded in 1683, in the forty-second year of his age. In a few years afterwards, the House of Lords passed an act to reverse his attainder, and in the preamble to the bill, his execution is called a murder! This was so far gratifying to his surviving friends, but alas! it could not give him back to them! Lord Russell's death was deeply lamented, for he was possessed of many virtues, and even his political enemies have testified to his probity, sincerity, and private worth. He had, in early life, been led away by the vortex of dissipation introduced at Court, by the restoration of Charles to the throne; from which however he was wholly reclaimed by a marriage with Lady Rachel, who was daughter to the Earl of Southampton, and the widow of Lord Vaughan. This excellent woman has left a bright example, which has much endeared her memory to posterity. Her humble piety, magnanimity and fortitude, her mild and equable disposition, with pleasing and attractive manners, unite in her all that is worthy of imitation in woman. Her mental acquirements too, in an age when female education received but little attention, were remarkable, and caused her society to be sought for by the literary men of the day. Archbishop Tillotson, and Bishop Burnet, were among her intimate friends, with both of them she continued to correspond for a number of years. Her personal appearance was extremely prepossessing. Her complexion was delicately fair, her eyes dark and intelligent, and of rather a thoughtful expression—the outline of her features was Grecian; but her forehead was higher and broader than is usually seen in woman, and would have been pronounced in phrenological language, to be singularly intellectual.

She had been married about fourteen years, when the unfortunate circumstances took place, which resulted in the cruel and unjust death of her husband. His trial is very interesting; it seems his fears of a Roman Catholic succession to the throne, had induced him to take some decisive steps for the exclusion of the Duke of York—(afterwards James the Second) a prince, no less remarkable for his cruelty, bigotry, and pride, than for the weakness and imbecility of his mind. In the mean time, a plot was formed for assassinating the king on his return from New Market; they deliberated upon a scheme for stopping the king's coach, by overturning a cart in the road, and shooting at him through the hedges, but the house in which the king lived at New Market, accidentally took fire, and he was thus obliged to leave that place eight days sooner than was expected, to which circumstance he owed his safety. This conspiracy was called the Rye-house plot, having derived its name from a farm so called, where those concerned in it used to meet. The detection of this plan, (although he was in no way connected with it) led to Lord Russell's imprisonment in the Tower. And when some of the Rye-house conspirators were executed, advantage was taken of the excitement thus produced, to bring him to trial, in July 1683. The chief evidence against him was Lord Howard, a man of very bad character, and one of the conspirators, who was content to take his own life, and accept of an infamous safety upon such terms. To the fact which principally aimed at Lord Russell's life, there was but one witness, and the law required two; this was however overruled—for justice, in this reign, was too weak for the prevailing party. Arthur Capel, Earl of Essex, was accused of the Rye-house plot, and committed to the Tower. He might have made his escape, but his tender consideration for his friend, Lord Russell, and a fear that his absence might produce a bad influence at his trial, occasioned him to remain at his country house, till a party of horsemen were sent to take him. He was found with his throat cut in the Tower, as if he had committed suicide, (but not without suspicion of his being murdered) on the morning of Lord Russell's trial; against whom this circumstance was used, as an argument to prove the truth of the conspiracy, and condemn him.

After his condemnation the king was strongly solicited in Lord Russell's favor, (and it was said would have been inclined to pardon him, were it not for the influence of the Duke of York) but he was inexorable. As Lady Rachel's father had ever been one of the king's best friends, and had rendered him many important services, she was encouraged to hope that he would at least grant her the favor of some reprieve for her husband. She accordingly drew up a petition that he might be spared but for six weeks longer than the time appointed for his execution—which she presented in person, throwing herself at the king's feet, bathed in tears, with all the eloquence of grief, beseeching him to hear her; but in vain—his stony heart remained unmoved! This supplication, says the historian, was the last instance of female weakness, (if it deserves the name) which she betrayed. Finding all applications vain, she collected courage, and not only fortified herself against the fatal blow, but endeavored by her example, to strengthen the resolution of her unfortunate Lord. All possible means were used to save his life. His attached friend, Lord Cavendish, gave a noble proof of his disinterested regard, by urging him to escape in his clothes, while he remained in prison. But to this Lord Russell would not listen. It was then proposed that a strong party of horse should attack the coach, as he was going to execution, and thus liberate him, which it was believed the people would have facilitated; but he would not consent that any of his friends should risk their own lives to save his—and submitted patiently to his fate, which he bore with true christian fortitude and resignation. It is said, that the Duke of York descended so low in his revenge, as to desire that this innocent man might be executed before his own door in Bloomsbury Square, which the king would not consent to have done. It is worthy of notice, that when as James the Second, he was at the height of his misfortunes, invaded by one son in law, abandoned by another, detested by his subjects, and hated by those who had suffered from his cruelty, he asked the advice of those he most confided in; and addressing himself to the Earl of Bedford, father to Lord Russell, 'My Lord,' said he, 'you are an honest man, have credit, and do me signal service.' 'Ah sir,' replied the Earl, 'I am old and feeble, I can do you but little service—I had indeed once a son!' James was so struck by this answer, that for some minutes he could not speak. On his trial, Russell having asked leave of the Court, that notes of the evidence, for his use, might be taken by the hand of another, the Attorney General, in order to prevent him from obtaining the aid of counsel, told him he might employ the hand of one of his servants if he wished it. 'I ask none,' answered the prisoner, 'save that of the lady who sits beside me.' When the spectators at these words turned their eyes, and beheld his wife, the daughter of the excellent Southampton, rising up to assist her husband in this his utmost distress, a thrilling emotion evidently pervaded the whole assembly. And indeed this high minded and incomparable woman, excited the admiration of all, by her deportment during this trying season. 'On the Tuesday before Lord Russell's execution, after dinner when his lady was gone, he expressed great joy at the magnanimity of spirit he saw in her; and said that parting with her was the hardest thing he had to do, for he said she would be hardly able to bear it; the concern about preserving him, filled her mind so now, that it in some measure supported her—but when that would be over, he feared the quickness of her spirit would work all within her. On Thursday when my lady was gone to try and gain a respite till Monday, he said he wished she would give over beating every bush, and running so much about for his preservation; but when he considered that it would be some mitigation of her sorrow, that she had left nothing undone that could have given him any probable hope, he acquiesced. And indeed I never saw his heart so near failing as when he spoke of her—sometimes I saw a tear in his eye, and then he would turn about and change the discourse. On Friday night late, my lady left him—he kissed her several times, and she kept her sorrow so much within herself, that she gave him no disturbance at parting.

If it is hard to part from those we love, when long protracted sickness and suffering have worn away the attenuated and feeble frame, and the mind, too, by its close and mysterious sympathy with its frail companion, becomes so affected as to lose its elasticity and enjoyment—‘and the evil days have come, when there is no pleasure in them’—how far more harrowing must it be, to be called upon to bid a last farewell to a beloved husband and father, in the prime of life, and in the full vigor of health! A man too, whose only crime was, an intention to serve his country—for which he was condemned to suffer a cruel and ignominious death by the hands of his fellow men. May God hasten the time, when man shall no longer plead justice in taking the life of his brother—when the proud nations of the earth, shall no longer permit so foul a stain to rest upon their religion, civilization, and refinement! ‘Life is emphatically the gift of God, and it is the prerogative of the giver alone, to take that which he gives.’

Lord Russell and his wife parted ‘with a composed silence, and she had such a command of herself, that when she was gone, he said, “the bitterness of death is passed”—for he loved her beyond expression. He then ran out in a long discourse concerning her—how great a blessing she had been to him, and said what a misery it would have been to him if she had not had that magnanimity of spirit, joined to her tenderness, as never to have desired him to do a base thing for the saving of his life. He said too there was a signal providence of God in giving him such a wife, where there was birth, fortune, great understanding, great religion, and great kindness to him, but her carriage in his extremity was beyond all—it was a great comfort to him, that he left his children in such a mother’s hands, and she had promised to take care of herself for their sakes.’ This promise she religiously performed, and continued his widow to the end of her life, surviving him above forty years. Lord Russell was beheaded in one week from the time of his trial. He laid his head upon the block with a composed and mild countenance—the executioner, though hardened by his office, was so affected, that his first aim was unsuccessful, and another stroke was required to complete this human sacrifice. Bishop Burnet, in writing of Lord Russell’s death, says, ‘I had been with him four afternoons before that; for he had desired to be left alone till twelve o’clock. He did all that while possess his soul with so clear a serenity, in such a calm and christian manner, that I reckon it a particular happiness as well as an honor that I attended upon him. He received the sacrament from the hands of Dr. Tillotson. He spent the rest of the day in devotion; then his children and friends came to him—he spoke to his children severally, in a way suited to their age, and with a good measure of cheerfulness, and took leave of them and his friends in so calm a manner as to surprise them all. The parting with his wife was not so easy; she had stayed with him all day, and till eleven at night, when they parted in solemn silence.’ As to Lady Russell, she bore the last shock with the same fortitude which she had maintained throughout the whole of this deep trial. When in open Court, by the side of her husband, she took notes, and made observations on all that passed, which might operate in his favor—when prostrate at the king’s feet, pleading her dead father’s services to him, in behalf of her husband, she was an object of the most lively compassion—but now, her high mindedness and self command, when without a tear she took a last leave of her husband, fearing to give way to her feelings lest she should distress him—render her worthy of the highest admiration.

After his death she retired to Woborne Abbey, where she spent most of her subsequent life, and devoted herself to the care and education of her children, to whom she was sole instructress, refusing the assistance of a governess. Her eldest daughter, a very lovely young woman, married Lord Cavendish, son to the much esteemed friend of Lord Russell, but died a short time afterwards. Her son, who was but three years old, when her husband was executed, lived to gratify all a fond mother’s dearest hopes—he married quite young, and fell a victim to the small pox, when about thirty years of age. And these heavy afflictions took place in the course of a few months.

A few weeks after Lord Russell’s death, Lady Rachel thus writes to Dr. Fitzwilliam, a clergyman for whom she had a very high esteem. ‘I need not tell you, good Doctor, how little capable I have been of an exercise like this. You will soon find how unfit I still am for it, since my disordered thoughts can offer me no other than such words as express the deepest sorrows, confused as my yet amazed mind is. But such men as you, and particularly one so much my friend, will I know bear with my weakness, and compassionate my distress, as you have already done by your good letter, and excellent prayer. I endeavor to make the best use I can of both; but I am so evil and unworthy a creature, that though I have desires, I have no disposition or worthiness towards receiving comfort. You that knew us both, and how we lived, must allow I have just cause to bewail my loss. I know it is common with others to lose a friend, but to have lived with such a one, it may be questioned how few can glory in the like happiness, and consequently can lament the like loss. Who can but shrink at such a blow, till by the mighty aid of his Holy Spirit, we will let the gift of God, which he hath put into our hearts, interpose? Alas! my understanding is clouded, my faith weak, sense strong, and the devil busy to fill my thoughts with false notions, difficulties and doubts of a future condition! But this I hope to make matter of humiliation and prayer. Lord, make me to understand the reason of these dark providences, that I sink not under the discouragements of my own thoughts! I know I have deserved this punishment, and will be silent under it, but yet my heart mourns—too sadly I fear, and cannot be comforted, because I have not the dear companion and sharer of all my joys and sorrows. When I see my children, I remember the pleasure he took in them, and this makes my heart shrink. But can I regret his quitting a lesser for a greater good? O if I steadfastly believed, I could not be dejected; for I will not injure myself to say, I offer my mind any inferior consolation to supply his loss.' A year afterwards, she says, 'time runs on, and usually wears off some of that sharpness of thought inseparable from my circumstances, but I cannot experience such an effect, every week making me more and more sensible of that miserable change in my condition; but the same merciful hand which has held me up from sinking in the extremest calamities, will I verily believe, do so still. I am entertaining some thoughts of going to that now desolate place Stratton, for a few days, where I must expect distressing reflections, it being a place where I have lived in sweet and full content—considered the condition of others, and thought none worthy of envy! But I must pass no more such days on earth—and having so many months mourned the substance, I think by God's grace, the shadows will not sink me. However places are indeed nothing—where can I dwell that his figure is not present with me! But I would not have it otherwise.'

At a period when the nation was generally imbued with religious intolerance, (what a paradox is contained in the phrase!) and the feeling between those of different persuasions was at its height, she thus expresses herself when directing Dr. Fitzwilliam to procure her a family chaplain. 'I could not live without one in my distress; I approve with you the Church of England the best church, and best offices and services in it, upon the face of the earth—that we know of; but sir, I shall covet one so moderate, as not to be impatient and passionate against all such as can think so too—but of such a temper as to be able to converse peaceably with such as may have freedom in my family (though not of it) without giving offence, which I take to be the best way of gaining good people to our opinions.' After the dangerous illness of her youngest child, she thus writes: 'God has been pitiful to my small grace, and removed a threatened blow which must have quickened and added to my sorrows—the loss of my poor boy. He has been ill, and God has let me see the folly of my imaginations, which made me apt to conclude I had nothing left, the deprivation of which could be a matter of much anguish, or the possession of any considerable refreshment. But I have felt the foolishness of this, for I know not how I could have parted from the little creature. I desire that my thoughtfulness for the real blessing of my children, may refresh my laboring, weary mind, with some joy and satisfaction in my endeavors to do that part towards them, their most dear and tender father would not have omitted. When I have done this piece of duty to my best friend and them, how gladly would I lay down by that beloved dust I lately went to visit. I had considered that I went not to seek the living among the dead—I knew I should not see him any more wherever I went, and had made a covenant with myself, not to break out into unreasonable and fruitless passion—but quicken my contemplation whither the noblest part had fled—to a country afar off, where no earthly power bears sway, nor can put an end to a happy society.' 'As a quiet submission is acquired under all the various methods of divine providence, I trust I shall be so supported, that though unfit thoughts may at times haunt me, they shall not break in importunately upon me; nor will I break off that bandage that time may lay over the wound. To them that seek the Lord, his mercies are renewed every morning—with all my strength will I seek him, and "though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." The great thing is to acquiesce with all one's heart in the good pleasure of God, who will prove us by his ways and dispensations. Who can tell his works from the beginning to the end? Who can praise his mercies more than wretched I, who have taken his chastisements so heavily, not weighing his mercies in the midst of judgments! His stroke was of the fiercest sure, but have I not reason to be thankful, that the soul I loved so well, lives in felicity, and shall do so to all eternity—that he was raised from a prison to a throne? Was I not enabled to shut up my own sorrows, that I increased not his sufferings by seeing mine? How were my sinking spirits supported by the companions of excellent and wise christians, admonishing me of my duty, instructing, reproving, comforting me. And further he has hitherto spared me my children, giving them hopeful understandings, and yet tractable and sweet dispositions. All these call for praises my dead heart is not exercised in, but this is my infirmity, and I bewail it. He that took our nature and felt our infirmities, knows my weakness and the sharpness of my sorrows. O Lord, lay not this sin to the charge of thy weak servant, but make me thankful that I had such a friend, and contented that he has had his dismissal from his attendance here. When my time comes, that I shall have mine, I know not how it will find me, but I am sure it is my best reviving thought now. When I am plunged in a multitude of sad and wild thoughts, I recover and recollect a little time will end this life, and begin a better that shall never end, and where we shall discover the ends and reasons of all those seeming dark and severe providences we have known. Thus I seem to long for my last day, and yet it is possible if sickness or any other precursor, of our dissolution here present, I would defer it if I could! So deceitful are our hearts—so weak is our faith. But I think I may argue again, that God has wisely implanted in our natures a shrinking at the approach of a separation; and that may make us content, if not desire a delay. If it were not so, many would not endure the evils of this life that now do so, though they are taught duty that obliges us thereto.'

In another letter to Dr. Fitzwilliam, on the occasion of her daughter's marriage to Lord Cavendish (whom Burnet says had the courage of an hero, with an unusual proportion of wit and knowledge, and a peculiar softness in his exterior deportment,) she thus expresses herself, 'My child was married yesterday. I hope the prospect is good, and that God's holy spirit has been my direction in this whole affair; and I trust in his mercy for his blessing upon it. We have all the promising hopes (I think) that can be had—of these I reckon riches as the least, though that ingredient is good if we use it rightly. This state undoubtedly affords the greatest comforts of life, or else the bitterest sorrow of it.'

Lady Russell and her children received many marks of attention and kindness from different members of the royal family, particularly from the Princess of Orange,* (afterwards queen Mary, wife to William the Third,) with whom she frequently corresponded. An extract from one of her letters written from Hague, may be acceptable to the reader. 'I cannot let Admiral Russell depart, without answering the letter I received by him, and assuring you my lady Russell, you shall never want one from me, if it can be any satisfaction to you. I am sure I may learn from you a manner to consider God's providences so

* A Princess more conspicuous for the accomplishments of her understanding, and disposition, than for her personal attractions. Burnet says, she was a singular instance of conjugal affection, insomuch that when the question was put to her, what she intended the Prince should be, if he came to the throne, her answer was, that the rule and authority should be his, for she only desired that he should obey the command, 'husbands love your wives,' as she should do, that of 'wives be obedient to your husbands in all things.'—She died in her 33d year. King William told Archbishop Tennison, that he could not but grieve, since he had lost a wife, who in seventeen years had never been guilty of an indiscretion. She had no relish for those indolent diversions, which are too common consumers of most peoples time, and which occasions as great waste of their minds as their fortunes. By her example, it became as much the fashion among ladies of quality to work as it had formerly been to be idle. She had read the best books in the English, French, and Dutch languages, with all of which she was almost equally familiar, but gave the most of her retired hours to the reading of the Scriptures and books concerning them.

as to make them easy. But I hope you will have no more occasions for that submission to all that comes from him in such sad manner as formerly, but that the happiness of your children, and all you undertake may give you that content you desire. I should be very glad if I could contribute to this in any way, or have an opportunity of showing how much I am your friend.'

WEEP NOT—WEEP NOT TO LEAVE THE HOME.

INSCRIBED TO MY FRIEND S. D. MANSFIELD.

BY MRS. C. W. HUNT.

WEEP not—weep not to leave the home,
Of childhood's sunny hours;
Shroud not the parting hour in gloom,
Nor dim the bridal flowers.
Chase from thy brow each saddening thought
That stays thy smile to night,
With joyance kindred hearts are fraught,
Quench not the spirit's light.

The household-tree where thou hast played,
Tho' strong above thy head,
Cannot forever yield the shade,
Witness the slumbering dead;
Have they not passed away, no more
To seek its sheltering rest?
The bird once taught from earth to soar,
Returns not to its nest.

Then wherefore weep! oft—oft again,
Perchance thy feet may tread
Thine ancient halls, and wake the strain
That with thy farewell fled.
Yet unto thee—still unto thee,
The treasured past is given;
Unfettered ever—thought springs free
Thine life and love are riven.

All things shall speak to thee of home;
The stars that gleam by night,
The flashing of the blue sea's foam,
Beneath the moon-beams light;
The violet's breath—the rose's bloom,
Borne past thee on the breeze,
All—all may speak to thee of home,
Yet weep not thou for these.

Bright—bright from many a thrilling grove,
From many a passing flower,
Fond memories of a sister's love,
Like summer rain shall pour;
Weep not; thou art another's now,
And shadowy lines of care
May darken o'er the cheerful brow,
A sister may not share.

Yet there is one thou'rt leaving now,
 For whom thou well may'st weep,
 One who has stilled grief's bitter flow,
 And watched thine infant sleep.
 For this—be hushed the voice of mirth,
 For this, thou well may'st weep;
 There is no love of mortal birth,
 So calm—so pure—so deep.

GOSSIPINGS OF IDLE HOURS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

HOUR NINTH.

Did you ever know, Lottie, what it is to love 'a tree or flower' (as Moore has it,) with a 'peculiar tenderness, not for its own beauty merely, but because it is 'linked to names you love?' It may be but a scraggy and scrawny shrub, yet to the heart it is dear and beautiful for memory's sake. There are many such to which I shall lead you some idle summer day.

On the brow of the hill is an old crooked tree,
 A favorite seat for my friends and me;

and under the shadow of its white blossoms and green leaves, I will some bright morning point out to you all the kingdoms of my heart. No, not all, Lottie, for some lie beyond the horizon, on the borders of beautiful streams; and the brightest and dearest is beyond ken, seen only by the clairvoyance of a christian's faith. I will show you 'the house where I was born,' half-hid by the tall elms that surround it; and the school-house on the plain, where for ten dream-like years of thoughtless life, I sat through winter day and summer day on the hard plank seat, tasting all kinds of ordinary knowledge, from the first rudiments of orthography up to the sublime lore of planets and stars; and the humble church where my heart first knelt to drink of the immortal springs whose waters can alone satisfy forever, and where it still receives gradual accessions of strength and faith from the pure fount of Divine Truth.

I can show you, too, the roof-tree,—a somewhat slender and thrifty elm, which could not, I fancy, have towered above the homestead long enough ago to have sheltered the earliest nestlings of the flock, but whose juvenility transcends the longest memory of your not very antiquated friend. There is a deal of poetry in the roof-tree, Lottie—a poetry that touches the universal heart. How popular that simple lay of Gen: Morris' has become; and how many a greater and lesser poet has struck the lyre to a similar theme. The last Repository has a pretty poem from Mrs. Spooner, which every body who has watched the robins building on the roof-tree, or sat in its shadow to read a favorite tale, can properly appreciate. And why should we not cherish these benefactors of our childhood, that link its golden hours with the more troubled seasons of maturer life? We cannot revivify the Past, and make our by-gone days pass over our heads again in their olden beauty; but we can use the Egyptian art of embalming what is dead, and more fortunate than they, can keep the spirit of the Past alive, when its form and outward glory is vanished forever.

Memory has certainly its pleasures, and it has as surely its pains. Some hearts, dear Lottie, are smitten by an early blight that tinges the very latest hour of a long life with regret; and some live to three score years and ten without being doomed to look back upon any crushing sorrow, or any fiery ordeal that seared them as they passed. But very few are there, however, who pass the mid-day of life, and find much of its morning brightness left. O my friend! how early does it behoove us to find some strength that shall not fail us through all life's seasons of weakness. What shall we do if we lose friends, health, and earthly hope, unless we have some place of refuge in the love of God? Strong, indeed, must we build our faith to withstand the assaults of a whole life's sorrows; yet by pious effort, we seldom fail to acquire that true and abiding confidence in God, which will sustain us under any burden of affliction; and surely, you know, Lottie, how much the acquisition is worth.

I sat down to gossip with you, and I thought my heart was full of bubbles that would effervesce, and run over like a summer fountain; but unaccountably my theme has made me sad, and I love you too well to make you a participator in my lachrymose meditations. So farewell! When you come again, charm me into a merry mood.

GENEVIEVE.

SUGGESTED BY AN EXQUISITE PICTURE, PAINTED BY T. B. READ.

BEAUTIFUL eyes of clear sapphire blue,
 Outrivaling heaven's serenest hue!—
 They haunt me whitherso'er I roam,
 Like pleasant thoughts of my childhood's home,
 Or the dewy light of a summer eve—
 O whence is their power, bright Genevieve?

They are downward cast as in maiden shame—
 Hast thou caught the sound of thy loved one's name?
 Does the delicate tint on thy soft, warm cheek,
 Of bashful young love in its morning speak?
 Dost thou fear lest some cold, strange eye should perceive
 Thy heart's treasured secret, sweet Genevieve?—

Thou art hearing a tale of wrecked love I trow,
 For a shade of sadness is on thy brow,
 O'er which thy tresses of hazel-gold,
 (The hue the laburnum's bright buds unfold,)
 In wavy beauty, luxuriant flow,
 Like sunset rays on a wreath of snow.

O mighty Genius! thy wondrous power
 Confers on thy children a glorious dower!
 Thou biddest the poet rehearse his lay,
 And crown'st him immortal, with wreaths of bay—
 Thy magic spell round the sculptor is thrown,
 And beauty is born from the lifeless stone!—

Thy spirit is breathed in the painter's soul,
 And he pants to arrive at the glorious goal,
 PERFECTION! he enters the charmed ring,
 And breathing forms from his pencil spring—
 O happy the artist, whose skill can weave
 Such radiant fancies as GENEVIEVE! CHARLOTTE.

A FEW HINTS ON MILLERISM.

BY HENRY BACON.

JOB xxxviii. 2: 'Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?'

THIS is the language of the Almighty to Job, and he is represented according to the high wrought poetry of the Orientals as answering Job 'out of the whirlwind,'—significant of the upspringing of divine truth amid the grief and tumult of the mind distracted by the deep and awful questionings concerning the ways and dealings of God with mortals. Hence some versions render the original thus: 'Then the Lord answered Job out of the whirlwind of grief and said, Who is this that darkeneth counsel with words without knowledge? No metaphor could be more expressive of the dawning of truth on an agitated mind than this, or of the recalling of the soul away from human perplexities to the simple truths which are all sufficient for duty, hope and trust. There is never a whirlwind in the soul from the study of that which is essential, unless counsel has been darkened with words without knowledge—words which throw no light on what seems to need illumination—words which fill the ear with sounds, but convey no ideas to the mind—words which are not like those of which it has been said—

'Wit and sense

Belong to them; they are the quintessence
 Of those ideas which the thoughts distil,
 And so calcine and melt again, until
 They drop forth into accents; in which lies
 The salt of fancy, and all faculties.'

The world has never wanted for those who illustrate the value of plain words by the use of dark ones. There are, and will be, enough of the would-be-wise who will give themselves to speculations that have no basis in fact, and who while sailing on the clouds will cry out lustily that an earthquake is destroying the earth, forgetting that they are on moveable vapor and not on the solid ground. And there will always be those who will heed their prophecies, not dreaming of the wisdom of questioning where the voice comes from, and the real reasons for the cries. The union of these cloud mariners and bewildered passengers, will always produce scenes to shame an age and country, and give the historian materials for a page of bitter satire. Thus is it, and thus will it be, with the projector and victims of the Miller mania concerning the destruction of the material world. A bitter satire on our age and country will be written by some future historian from the fooleries enacted by these dreamers—dreamers, however honest in intention they may be. A bitter satire on our age and country, I say, because amid the wonderful aids to intellectual culture granted to us—amid the advances made in science and philosophy, theology receives so little aid therefrom and remains so much darkened with words without knowledge, and men claiming to be learned give those rules of interpretation to Scripture which open it to every class of enthusiasts, and enables them to draw evidence, so called, in behalf of contradictory theories. Christians have too often valued passages of Scripture as they do a music-box—the value is enhanced by the number of tunes which can be drawn from the same barrel. Hence popular commentaries speak of 'the wisdom of God' being manifested in giving as many senses as possible to one passage, by which a text may have a primary, a secondary, an allegorical, and a parabolical meaning. By this method the clearest reasonings in reference to our Lord's prophecies against Jerusalem are as nothing, because we are directed immediately to consider the typical meaning. To this method of making the Bible like heathen oracles of varying responses, contradictory, and, when compared, absurd, we owe the fanaticism which so often has divorced religion from reason, and rendered theology opposed to every thing rational.

But yet there is good even in this confusion—this darkening of God's clear counsels with words without knowledge. There is good in it which many discern not, but which it is easy to descry. There is good in the strong manifestations of the religious sentiment, and the wants of the soul which can only be met by religion. The earnest controversy and the divisions caused by the investigations of political principles, or matters of philosophy and science, do not betoken an indifference to the truth, but earnestness of soul to know something, and to advocate as it thinks it knows. So with religion. The earnestness manifested in controversies shows the interest the mind has in religious truth; and these controversies are doing great good which shall be manifest in due time, as Spring, with its greenness and verdure, its blossomings and its music, follows the storms and severity of Winter.

I was forcibly struck with a remark made to me in conversation with a venerable matron a short time since while we were conversing of the agitations in the religious world. 'They are doing good,' said she. 'People used to read a chapter every day in their Bible and be content, without seeking out its meaning, and its union with other portions of holy writ. But now they are looking here and there all through the Bible and they'll learn something.' An admirable distinction is here made between reading portions of Scripture, and learning something by comparing things spiritual with spiritual. The Bible should be read. If to some it be a mountain covered with mists and shadows, let them remember it is a mountain of 'hidden treasure,' and is stationary and permanent, while the mists and shadows may soon clear up. They are often but as a shade on the fair countenance which can be chased away by one smile of affection from the glowing eye of love. Let the love of Truth be in the heart, and wonderfully will its smile remove shadows from the sacred page. The soul will rejoice in its radiance, and as it beholds the increasing effulgence, its earnest prayer will be that its eyes may be anointed lest it be dazzled 'with excess of light.'

Christians have been so easily persuaded that there is more than one sense to Scripture, and are so prone to disregard the context of a passage, that very readily they have allowed whatever supposition a preacher or writer started from, if he did not offend long cherished opinions and prejudices. They are like the sire who never looked out for the correctness of any preaching save that of some stranger, and was willing to give assent to his own minister's preaching though he slept through the discourse! Hence God's counsels are darkened in their minds by human words without knowledge—words from learned ignorance.

I propose to illustrate this important fact, by what has become a serious matter—the imaginations of William Miller. I shall endeavor to show that his premises are false, and that they exhibit great ignorance of common facts of history. Precisely as I am accurate in doing this, will be the evidence that his conclusions are false and unfounded; for though it be true, as the ancient proverb saith, 'figures will not lie,' yet it is just as true, that figures will make an honest man lie if he be not careful and just in using them. A foreman of a jury was once told by an enraged judge, that the case which the jury could not agree upon was just as plain as that two and two make four. 'That depends,' said the juror, 'on the manner in which you place the figures, for sometimes two and two make twenty-two.' The facts of the case did not unite or concrete in the minds of the jurors, as in the mind of the judge, and therefore the result was not the same in the one as in the other.

It is not a little astonishing that the whole of the new mania depends on the English translation of a certain phrase, which is easily explained. The passage referred to is that in which Daniel speaks of 70 weeks as the time which should intervene between the going forth of the commandment to restore and rebuild Jerusalem and the cutting off or death of the Messiah. The argument built on this is—that as the weeks here spoken of are weeks of years, therefore Daniel's days are all to be considered as years. If this were allowed, another question would arise, which is—What commandment is alluded to? There were several, and one is chosen which alone can appear to favor the delusion. But the regarding days as years is not allowed to be correct, and this method of numerating time is never to be adopted save that it is expressly stated to be the divine method. The form of speech used by Daniel which in our Bible is rendered weeks, is, we are assured by Biblical scholars, a form used only by Daniel, and the peculiarity of its use by him is easily explained. The word rendered weeks is literally sevens, the plural of our common numeral seven; and the context must always decide what designative term should be applied to it in any given text. To do this we find assistance in the case before us, by consulting the subject of Daniel's meditation when the vision was given him, and it is the neglect of this which gives speciousness to many of the Millerian suppositions. What Gabriel came to cause Daniel to understand, is not considered in connection with what he desired and prayed to know, but to matters altogether different.

In the context we discover Daniel meditating on the seventy years captivity of the Jews foretold by Jeremiah, Dan. ix. 2, wrestling in prayer, confessing his sin and the sin of Israel, and imploring mercy from God on the holy city. Dan. ix. 3—20. While he was speaking and praying, 'the man Gabriel,' whom he had seen before in a vision, Dan. viii. 16, appeared to him and touched him about the time of the evening oblation. 'And,' says the prophet, 'he informed me and talked with me, and said, O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding; therefore understand the matter and consider the vision.' Then the prophecy was given which has ever been excellent food for mystical speculators. 'Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, &c.' Now let it be remarked that as Daniel was meditating on the seventy years captivity, that supplies the term which is to be applied to the seventy weeks, or the seventy sevens, by which we are to read seventy sevens years. And let it also be remembered and remarked, that the Jews had sabbatic years, Lev. xxv. 8, by which their years were divided into weeks of years. And again we may add, that when Daniel describes his fast in chapter x. 2, he speaks of it as 'three weeks of days,' as any one can see by looking into the marginal notes of a Bible where the Hebrew is referred to. He would not have said 'weeks of days,' were not weeks or sevens an indefinite word or term; and as there was nothing preceding to give it meaning, he made it definite by adding days, giving us to understand 21 days. There is, therefore, no reason whatever for asserting that Daniel's days mean years. The passage in Ezekiel iv. 6, which is the only one referred to, to justify the assumption that days mean years, affords not a shadow of proof, because in that case an express command was given so to use terms; and a good reason was afforded, as the prediction was to correspond with history. Refer to Ezekiel, chapter iv, and it will very plainly be seen, that punishment of years was to come upon the Jews according to the days the prophet lie upon a couch to which he was chained. It does not give a rule for interpreting all prophecy, for in this case days were made a sign of years. The prophet's depression was a symbol of the depression which should come to Israel—a year to them, for a day to him.

Let us now refer to the 'a time, times, and a half,' in the seventh and twelfth chapters of Daniel. That 'a time,' when applied to denote a duration means any thing more than a year, no one can bring the least proof. By referring to Daniel iv. 25, we read concerning Nebuchadnezzar that he should make his dwelling with the beasts of the field and eat grass as oxen until seven times should pass over him. Explain this according to the rule given whereby a time means a year whose days are years, and as three hundred and sixty days are reckoned as a year, Nebuchadnezzar must have been doomed to dwell in the field no less than 2520 years! But we know that at the end of seven years he was restored and praised the Most High God. 'A time' must therefore be understood as signifying a year; 'a time, times and a half,' signify three and a half years; and if we look into history we find events which correspond with the prophecy—events which fulfilled it. What Daniel prophesied in the seventh chapter concerning 'a time, times and a half,' finds a fulfillment in the history of Antiochus Epiphanes, who sent his generals against Jerusalem, caused an awful slaughter of men, and captivity of women and children, condemned the Jews to eat and sacrifice contrary to their laws, and put to martyrdom those who refused. The statue of the Olympian Jupiter was placed in the temple, and honor was paid to it as Jehovah. This disorder and blasphemy continued for about three and a half years, and fulfilled the words of Daniel. After this, the temple was re-sanctified and dedicated by Judas Maccabees, and the flame of the daily sacrifice once more arose from the altar.

I cannot give time or space to consider the history which fulfilled the other like period, three and a half years, in the twelfth chapter. History does give a very accurate fulfillment of the particulars, and any one interested can easily find the records. But I have shown the falsity of the Millerian premises, and the falsity of the conclusions, of course, is proved. And it would be easy to show that the Jews were not warned at all of one of the most terrible times of calamity with which they were ever visited, if the far off reference of Daniel's prophecy be the true one. It had an accurate fulfillment in the terrors of an awful siege, and whatever after application may have been, or may be made of it, could only have been and can only be made by way of accommodation.

It would be easy to employ much time in showing the great errors of Chronology which are made essential to the support of the theory alluded to, but I can glance only briefly at one or two instances.

It is asserted, in order to obtain a good starting point for a certain calculation, that paganism commenced in Rome in the year 158 before Christ,* whereas paganism always existed in Rome from its foundation, which according to Cato was 752 years before Christ, or according to Varro, whose date is generally received, 754 B. C., and at its founding idolatrous ceremonies were performed as every school-boy knows. It is not a little singular to notice that the Theorist makes the commencement of 'Pagan Rome' to be when 'the first league was made between the Romans and the Jews!' 'Then,' we are told, 'began the Pagan beast to exercise his influence over the people of God;' as though for the almost 600 years preceding, this influence had not at all been exercised!

So also of the commencement of Christianity in the Roman Empire.† The theory to be supported requires that a choice be made of the time when a certain king—Clovis—was converted in France in 496; and other kings were brought over in 508, as the time when paganism ended in Rome, whereas the king alluded to was not converted till after the dissolution of the Roman Empire! Certainly it must be allowed that the conversion of Constantine, Emperor of Rome, at the opening of the fourth century, in connection with the legal establishment of Christianity about A. D. 337, would furnish a somewhat better date for the end of paganism in that Empire; and to that date it is commonly referred. Though not totally suppressed by him, and restored by Julian, yet it was abolished and became extinct in 408. 'The capture of Rome,' says Milman, 'consummated the ruin of paganism,' and that was in 410, by Alaric, 'the scourge of God.'

But I must not dwell on these errors of chronology, as space must be given to one fact which is, of itself, sufficient to show the errors of the system—a fact which will demonstrate that according to the calculations made, allowing their correctness, the world should have been destroyed four years ago.

In the margins of old large family Bibles a note may be found stating that our common date of calculating time from the birth of Christ is four years deficient, and therefore the present year should truly be 1847. It may be useful to refer to the reason of this, and while it sets aside the calculations which have alarmed so many, it sets before us most eloquently the advantages of science.

'No attempt was made to reckon the years from the time of our Savior's birth till the year 527, when Dionysius Exiguus, a Roman abbot, suggested that this reverence ought to be paid to the Savior of the world. He therefore began so to date the years, and assumed that the first year of the Christian era was the 4714 of the Julian period. There is no historical record, by which the Nativity can be precisely ascertained; he therefore decided what year it was by such indications as he could gather by comparing the sacred history with that of profane historians. But those were times in which much less was known concerning these points than in the present age; and a mistake was then made in fixing the time of our Savior's birth which has never since been corrected.

'The manner in which this mistake was brought to light, is a fine illustration of the advantages of science. Who would suppose that Astronomy could have pointed out an error in chronology? and yet so it was. Dionysius fixed the first year of Christ in the 4714 of the Julian period. But Josephus mentions that during Herod's last illness there was a remarkable eclipse of the moon. On consulting astronomical tables, we are enabled to ascertain the date of that eclipse to the day and hour; we find that it took place in the year 4710th year of the Julian period, on the 13th of March, three hours past midnight at Jerusalem. Now we know that our Savior was born before Herod died; so that he must have been born at least four years earlier than that which was fixed upon as the first of the Christian era. He must have been born some time before the death of Herod, since his parents took him into Egypt to save him from that tyrant's malice, and kept him there till Herod died. So that astronomy makes it perfectly clear that our Savior was born at least four, possibly five, years earlier than the time assigned by the nativity; and if the Christian era had been correctly determined, the present year would be 1847 instead of 1843, possibly 1848. The reason why the mistake, though universally admitted, never has been corrected, is, that we cannot fix the precise year, in the first place, and in the second, the error has prevailed for more than 1200 years through the dates of all histories, so that much confusion would be the result in chronology without any corresponding gain.' It is at least, an error that may do some good in trapping the self-wise in their own craftiness, proving that if their mathematics are correct, the world has been destroyed and made over again insensibly to all the living! At least it should have been destroyed four years ago.

It might also be remarked that in this new system 360 days are counted for a year, causing a loss of five and a quarter days each year since the birth or death of Christ—calculations being made from both of these events. The Jews did indeed, I allow, count 360 days as a year, or reckoned 12 months of 30 days as a year; but Moses discerned that this would produce confusion, and hence he made an arrangement by which a thirteenth month was added when it became necessary. He did not leave this to any whim of priest or ruler, but imposed a necessity which betokened his forecast and prudence. The harvest moon was the first of the year, which was called by Moses 'the ear moon,' and at its full, ripe ears of barley were to be offered as first fruits unto God. But by the lunar year not compassing the time of the sun's journey, the first month would come earlier the next year, and still earlier the next, and then the harvest would not be ripe to offer. When this was the case, the Jews were to regard that moon as the thirteenth month and not the first of the new year. They were to wait for the next moon when the harvest would be ripe—that was to be the ear moon—the first of the new year. Hence the astronomer was not left alone with the knowledge of the year's beginning, or when the odd month should be added. Every husbandman could tell whether the harvest would be ripe or not, by the middle of the moon; and if not, he needed no public authority that that moon was the thirteenth of the old, and not the first of the new. Where there is no such arrangement, there is perpetual confusion. In Turkey, at the present day, where they go by the moon without adding such a month, the festivals travel back every anniversary till they go quite through the year.*

But enough has been said to set forth the folly of the theory that receives so much favor and is producing so much terror. It is, however, a legitimate fruit of the religious fanaticism that has so deluged the world with 'excitements,' and the disregard of calm and individual study of the Scriptures.

Let us, reader, remember that Christ not only visits our earth, but takes up his abode with the faithful—they are his body for the indwelling and right manifestation of his spirit. He comes to every heart that is true to him, and joyous is his coming as was his entrance to the homes of Judea—to the humble abode of Martha and Mary.

By every affectionate thought of a friend removed from our eyes, he or she comes to us. We see the beloved one and often transfigured before us. So with holy and affectionate thoughts of Jesus. By every thought of waywardness and guilt, and our need of a Redeemer,—he comes to us. He comes to bid us keep alive the feeling till we exercise godly repentance unto life; he comes to bid the tumultuous waves of anguish be still, and breathe upon the troubled soul the serenity of heaven; he comes to enlighten our ignorance, and to be unto us the way, the truth, and the life. He comes to the dying believer, and says 'I am the Resurrection and the Life.' He tarries there with heavenly and balmy consolation, giving sweet visions of the future, and delightful thoughts of the world to come. And when the last moment comes and the eyes close forever to the things of this life, the lips move and the prayer is—'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!'

Even so, come Lord Jesus! Come to convict of sin, to turn to righteousness, to confirm in virtue, to restrain in joyousness, to cheer in sorrow, to comfort in bereavement, and to give a glorious hope in death!

CHRIST CRUCIFIED.

BY REV. JOHN G. ADAMS.

'AND behold the vail of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom; and the earth did quake, and the rocks rent.' Matt. xxvii. 51.

CHRISTIAN, dost thou gaze in wonder,

As the elemental thunder

Breaks in wild commotion out?

Marvel not,—thy Lord is dying;

'Tis the voice of nature sighing;

Now the hosts of darkness shout!

Impious revel they are keeping,

While their foe in death is sleeping—

While the grave its prey retains;

But the moment comes when broken

Is the spell—for God hath spoken,

And the vanquished lives and reigns!

He for whom the rocks are rending,

On the wings of power ascending,

Shall the gates of hell surprise;

At whose groan the earth is shaking,

He, death's gloomy prison breaking,

Bids its sleepers all arise!

Christian, stand not lost in wonder;

Mightier powers are rent asunder

Than the rock or temple vail;

Bands which man hath failed to sever—

Powers of Sin and Death, forever!

Savior of all people, Hail!

Malden, Mass.

OBITUARY.

DEPARTED this life, on the 4th Feb. Mrs. MARIA, wife of GIDEON CONGDON, of Providence, aged 31.

Thus has closed the mortal life of one who was beloved by a large circle for the virtues which so deeply endeared her to her companion and immediate relatives. She was one of those active and earnest spirits who will toil for their home as long as strength will hold out, and then yield to necessity patiently and calmly. Her sickness was of long duration, subjecting her to all the changes, hopes and doubts, which so commonly attend consumption. When the conviction came that she soon must pass away, it came without terror, for her beautiful faith fortified her soul against all the enemies of its peace. Her great effort was to realize more and more of heaven, till at last she said—'When I shut my eyes, heaven is all before me in beauty.' Hence there was no shrinking from the tomb, for her eye was on that which lies beyond, where there is no sorrow, nor death. 'Pray,' said she, 'that I may depart soon, or that patience may be given me to wait the time.' And her prayer was answered. The angel of Patience dwelt with her as a sweet sister, and kept her mind calm and her spirit strong to bear the pain and weariness of her lot. Her death was as peaceful as the closing of a flower, and the spirit departed gently as the last breath of fragrance goes from the rose. The sweetness of her look in death told of the serenity of her mind. Her last words—words of prayer—we trust are answered—'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!'

Blessed be God for the quietness of life's close to our sister! Sweet are the memories of her pleasantness in the social circle, her fidelity to the duties of home, and her love of the house of God and the table of the communion. May the comforts and consolations of her blessed faith in illimitable and all redeeming Grace, be imparted to him who is sadly bereaved, and to his motherless child! May her desires and hopes be remembered and cherished, and her son become an abiding blessing to his father. May her death be sanctified to the Church of which she was a valued member, and may it be life to them, inciting them to realize more of the power and preciousness of that which is Christ in us the hope of glory! B.

MISS SEDGWICK. Miss Sedgwick is a jewel of a writer. We admire her works, but admiration is not predominately sensitive—we love them even more than we admire them. There is a kindly feeling and a domestic charm about them, and they ought to form a portion of every man's library who loves his children and lives happy with his wife. They are redolent of home and the sweet ties of relationship; and the man or woman who does not relish them, was born for folly, frippery, fashionable novels, silver forks, and second-hand gentility.

And yet Miss Sedgwick can go from the fireside to the woods. She is not uproariously national, like Cooper, but she can well depict the features of her 'own green forest land,' and the denizens thereof, whether aboriginal or 'pale faced.' There are few nobler creatures than her Indian girl, in 'Hope Leslie,' and certainly no sweeter or more lovable heroine extant than Hope Leslie. To appropriate the language of Mr. Veller, senior—'She is an uncommon fine 'oman—she is!' We know no more of Miss Sedgwick personally than we do of the queen of Tabiti; but we never close one of her works, or read even the minor sketches, without feeling that she is one of the most amiable, able, sensible, gentle, and withal unaffected women, that ever took pen in hand.

EDITOR'S BOOK TABLE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., MARCH, 1843.

History of the Great Reformation of the Sixteenth Century in Germany, Switzerland, &c. By J. H. Merle D'Aubigne, President of the Theological School of Geneva. New York: Robert Carter. 1843. 3 vols. pp. 390. 400. and 504.

It would seem that there could not be any more astonishment in reference to cheap printing, but we must confess our astonishment at the expedients adopted of late to spread abroad literature. We rejoice that not only is the taste for novels and romances gratified to a surfeit, but food is to be sent forth in this manner for those who hunger after thought—who ask for the fruit of centuries—books that 'preserve,' as Milton says, 'as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of the living intellect that bred them.' Here we have before us a handsome and accurate edition of a most excellent, nay, a very superior work, for one dollar the three volumes! This History of the Great Reformation is one that best claims our attention; the author manifests great powers of condensation, and of graphically describing scenes and events. We regard his estimate of the chief characters in the great drama as just, and we like him for his discrimination, and the suggestive thoughts which he scatters all through the work—good themes for sermons. One dollar will give to our readers three rich, well printed volumes, with all the notes and references. It is an abominable custom with many American publishers to cut off notes and references; we have been cheated many times in this way; and therefore would be careful to remark that the Philadelphia edition of D'Aubigne's History, now in course of publication, has not the notes, &c.

Lady's Book. Philadelphia. Nos. for January and February. 1843.

We can imagine how long and grievously the consciences of the lady editors of this Magazine must have troubled them in reference to the wasp-waisted figures in the 'Plates of Fashion,' as by those plates they pictured what was directly against their preaching in respect to health and the moral duty of obedience to the physical laws. Conscience has triumphed, and now we are presented with 'natural forms' clothed with the 'fashions,' and we are exhorted not to be astonished that expectation is cherished of materially aiding the cause of moral improvement by the Fashion Plates! Mrs. Hale says she intends to 'pay particular attention to this subject, and explain by what means the fashions of dress may be made auxiliary to that moral and mental progress which the Lady's Book has so steadily advocated, and ladies of the highest reputation for piety and talents, are engaged with her in this matter.'—We rejoice that something is to be attempted to make artificial hour glass forms unfashionable. But we are surprised that one of the ladies 'of the highest reputation for piety and talents,' should feel authorized to write as she has, that 'a great portion of our ingenious and industrious countrywomen, especially in retired places, have no other guide in fashioning their dresses except these plates.' This, we suppose, is the reason that so many have no regard to the law of fitness and comfort. Success to the new reform! The figures in the Feb. No. are really quite an improvement. The first 'moral use' which is made of the 'Plates,' is in the Feb. No., where ladies are exhorted to so look on them as to see if they cannot spare something from the ornamental and give the something saved to aid a charity school! This morality of Fashion Plates reminds us of a letter we once received from the Western Rail Road Corporation, we believe, requesting us to preach on the 'Moral Influence of Rail Roads,' but we never could 'get the steam up,' and it was 'no go.'

The Christian Name and Christian Liberty. A Sermon preached at the Church in Brattle Square, on Sunday, Oct. 30, 1842. By Samuel K. Lothrop, Minister of that Church. Published by request. Boston: 1843. Pp. 39.

Thus runs the title page of a very excellent sermon which was preached by request of 'an old member of Brattle Street Society,' in answer to a note that the preacher would 'define' his 'position and opinions as to two points,—First, as to the measure of faith that constitutes a man a Christian, that is, gives him a claim to the Christian name and privileges,—Secondly, as to the principles of Christian liberty, what are they? how to be applied?' These questions are fairly met and plainly and forcibly answered—and we think justly so. The question first proposed is not, What constitutes a man a real Christian? but what gives him a claim to the Christian name and privileges? And first, Christianity is defined as 'a religion of facts.' It is a positive and authoritative revelation, resting upon facts incontrovertibly true. Historical Christianity is the basis of Spiritual Christianity; and the natural cannot be separated from the supernatural portions of the Gospel history, and preserve the credibility of either. By the miracles much of the character of Christ is developed. Many of the most peculiar, striking, and convincing of those inimitable characteristics of nature and reality, which to our moral perceptions become such irresistible evidences of truth and reality, are to be found only in those scenes in which Jesus is exhibited walking in the high and solitary path of divine power and performing miraculous acts of beneficence. If we yield these, the harmony of the Gospel appeal to our moral perception is destroyed. Hence, the preacher acknowledges all as Christians, or entitled to the Christian name and privileges, who go to the teachings of Christ, to the New Testament, as a record of facts, for authority and proof to establish and sustain their creed. To give that name to one who places Jesus Christ and the Scriptures on the same platform with Plato and Socrates and their writings, and who receives his instruction simply because he thinks it pure and good, destroys all its force and meaning. Christian faith and the assumption of the Christian name, imply a belief, founded upon the historical truth of the New Testament that Jesus is the Christ,—that is, the sent, the anointed, the expressly commissioned and appointed of God, in a peculiar and authoritative sense, his messenger.

The second question is not concerning religious, but Christian liberty. The preacher elaborately shows that the different doctrines drawn from Christianity, are distinctions in, not of Christianity—they do not separate Christianity from other religions, nor those who are, from those who are not, Christian believers. Christian liberty, is liberty to be a Christian—liberty to go to the New Testament as a genuine and authentic history of the teachings, conduct and character of Christ, and gather and deduce from it such truths and doctrines as it seems to the individual to sustain and establish. It places all sects upon the same level, the same platform. This is a very brief epitome.

This discourse is an excellent piece of composition, and well worthy for its truth and power, to be read and preserved.

Tenth Annual Report of the Seamen's Aid Society, of the City of Boston. 1843. Pp. 26.

This is an exceedingly interesting document. It gives an account of the character and operations of one of the most useful institutions of which Boston has to be proud. This Society is an association of Ladies, under whose patronage a 'Mariner's Home,' or Boarding House for seamen, and a 'Clothing Store,' are kept in operation. The great objects of the Society are, 1. To assist the sick and disabled seamen and their suffering families. 2. To give aid and encouragement to the poor and industrious females belonging to families of seamen. 3. To promote the education of seamen's children, and improve the condition of seamen and their families. Good and great objects, indeed, and deserving the co-operation of christians of every name. Large sums have been paid for work, instruction, &c., the past year, by the Society, in furtherance of their object. The Society well use their means, and do a great amount of good. In the 'House' a reading room is kept open to all seamen, well furnished with papers and books, and meetings are also held weekly for religious improvement. 'Father Taylor' is about leaving, or has left Boston, to journey, or sail for his health. The prices paid for work are nearly double what the 'slop shops' pay females, and yet the articles are sold at the same prices as at such stores. At the prices named in the Report, work women could well support themselves by steady employment.

The Lowell Offering and Magazine. Written and edited by Factory Operatives. Lowell: Wm. Schouler. January 1843.

We receive this publication just often enough to have a knowledge of its changes, but always greet it with pleasure and conscientiously commend it. It is now edited by Miss Harriet Farley, who acquits herself well. We are somewhat surprised at the declaration in her notice of Dickens' 'Notes,' that not more than one in fifty of 'the factory girls' interest themselves in supporting their Magazine! The Offering is now issued in a handsome style, highly creditable to the publisher, and the No. before us is ornamented with a fine engraving—'The Fairies.' We never knew before that the Fairies had such ugly looking musicians to play for them when they danced. Success to the Offering.

An Address, delivered before the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association, Oct. 6, 1842. By George G. Smith. Pp. 55.

This is the last of the Triennial Addresses, and we deem it creditable no less to the Association than to the orator, as on the last two anniversaries they have chosen speakers from the learned professions—and thus something has been done to perpetuate the operation of what the author of the Address regards as the principle which has kept the mechanic down or in the rear—the supposition that intellectual effort is incompatible with manual labor. The remedy for the depressed condition of the mechanic lies with himself, and he does wrong to talk against the aristocracy of the professions and then immediately give his vote to pass by hundreds of brother mechanics and call in a lawyer or some other of the literati, to address the Association.

The subject of Mr. Smith's Address is the History of the Mechanic—what mechanics have been, and not what they have done. He speaks of the scantiness of facts in history in reference to his theme, but carefully gleans where he can matters which show that the operative classes were always degraded among the principal nations of antiquity, especially the Egyptian, Roman, and Grecian people. At the dissolution of the Roman Empire their condition was somewhat improved—the only civilization was that of the anvil and forge, and at the Court of the kings of Wales, the king's chief smith had a place at the royal table next to the royal chaplain. With the feudal system, mechanics again fell into disesteem, and severe struggles were had to gain any privileges. Defoe tells how in his day distinctions were kept up, even in such matters as street lights at night—courtiers were lighted with torches, merchants and lawyers with large candles, and mechanics with lanterns. Thus were matters till the eighteenth century, when the steam engine revolution commenced. We marvel that our author did not choose to say less of the former matters, in order that he might have space to say something of the influence of labor saving machinery on the operative classes;—a very important theme. He turns away from England, and sketches the condition of the Colonies—citing one instance of the interdictory power exercised over the mechanic;—the Colonies in 1732 were prohibited from exporting hats from one colony to another, so that a Boston hat could not be sold in Connecticut or New Hampshire, &c.; business was confined to each colony. In 1750, iron mills and forges and furnaces, for slitting or rolling iron, or making steel, were forbidden to be erected in the Colonies. This course of restriction found its climax at the time when it was openly said in Parliament, that America 'must not be allowed to manufacture so much as a hob nail.' The Revolution brought a new day for the mechanic, and the mechanical genius of our countrymen has proved itself capable to any emergency, and its fame is wide spread through the world.

The Address closes with some most excellent reflections on the essentials to the elevation of the operative classes, and the necessity of intellectual and moral culture; and on the duty of the Association carrying out more fully the avowed objects of the institution. The production is a valuable one, a calm, unpretending utterance of truth to be reflected upon, and from which important lessons may be drawn.

Sermon preached at the Ordination of Rev. Amos Smith, as Colleague Pastor of the New North Church, (Unitarian) in Boston, Dec. 7, 1842. By Francis Parkman, D. D. With the Charge, the Right Hand of Fellowship, and an Appendix. Boston: W. Crosby & Co. Pp. 46.

We see nothing in the sermon to remark upon, nothing original or even forcible, but what is common on such occasions. The Charge, by Rev. E. S. Gannett, is something to be read and remembered—to take up again and again, and at every perusal, deeper and deeper the soul will feel what a regenerating power might be exerted by the ministry, if the spirit of this charge were felt and obeyed. We wish that some of those who desire to be every thing, would just read and earnestly ponder the sober truths of this Charge as the preacher speaks solemnly of the minister giving himself wholly to the work of the ministry—to be devoted to it—if there is any good in him, to let the people of his charge have it, and to be careful not to impair the value of his work by enlarging its extent. 'One well finished cottage is worth two half-built houses of far more imposing exterior.' This Charge is certainly one of the very best we ever read or heard.

Hints on Modern Evangelism, and on the Elements of a Church's Prosperity. A Discourse delivered in the Charles Street (Boston) Baptist Church, Oct. 9, 1842. By Daniel Sharp. Published by request. Boston: W. D. Ticknor. 1843. Pp. 24.

I have always, from early childhood, entertained and felt a deep respect and esteem for the author of this pamphlet, though I never spake with him, and I doubt whether a word was ever lisped against his perfection as a christian minister, till the 'revival excitements' turned the heads and soured the hearts of many of his brethren. During all the contentions and foolishness incident on the exaltation of such a person as 'Elder Knapp,' Dr. Sharp has pursued a firm, consistent and truly christian course. I like, as I have ever liked, his manly plainness and straight forward devotion to the permanent interests of christian society, and his repudiation of any part in the 'modern evangelism' that is as well suited to do good to the church as an army of locusts is to make a field fruitful and lovely to behold. 'He knew,' he says, 'that, if he stood to his convictions and principles, he would suffer an almost total eclipse; but he knew also, as he does now, that the period of his obscurity would not last for ever.' It seems that this eclipse came so far to the eyes of some, that many have expressed their doubts of his ever having been converted! He would do a great service to the interests of vital religion by filling up his outline of 'who and what modern Evangelists are,' for the outline shows the skill of a master. The complete picture is needed, that it may be hung up before the Baptists every where, and assistance given them to contrast it with pictures of the past. His voice would be heard, and slumbering conscience would be awakened by its tones to condemn 'the measures and tendencies' of 'the novel system of Evangelism.' His outline shall have a place in our pages.

UNIVERSALIST AND LADIES' REPOSITORY.

APRIL 1843.

CHRIST'S IDEAL OF THE GOOD, AND OUR LACK.

BY HENRY BACON.

A POET sat rapt in his musings, gazing on the open pages of Homer. A friend entered. 'Aha, weaving new fancies out of old rainbows, are you?' 'Not so, I am only lighting my torch at the sun.' He had opened the works of the immortal bard that the presence of lofty genius might give new force to an ambitious spirit. He gazed thereon as he would have gazed on the stars, not to pluck them from their spheres to make them his own, but to drink in an inspiration from their solemn beauty and rich magnificence. Even thus would I make my theme to myself, that I may fill the blank page with words of usefulness. And is it not thus in itself? It is;—and though my torch may be but an inch of flax, yet will I attempt to light it, and let it burn as it will—as the fire-fly does all she can when she lifts her wing. Not in vain shines the glow-worm's spark—it attracts one mate.

To treat of Christ as the Good—as a Reality diviner than the Ideal of the bards of the fore-ages, would seem to be an ambitious theme enough. So be it—till the soul obtains a better. It has been a theme to inspire the loftiest eloquence, and words have come forth from souls glowing with it that have been words of fire, making their way amid the false growth of passion and feeling, and consuming it—as the flame kindled by the cultivator of the soil clears away the over-running tares and weeds of the land, so that the smiles of the sunshine, may woo the little springs to rise to the surface, and greenness and beauty be the result. Christ as realized goodness is glorious to behold. To look on him aright, we must not simply call him up in his individuality, abstract from the great world in which he moved, but of which he was not. The history of Progress as given in the histories of individuals, requires that we place ourselves amid the circumstances of their times and judge of the tendencies thereof, awarding them excellence according as they produced in themselves the results of the best tendencies of their age, or advanced beyond all that could be expected from those tendencies. We must not bring them to our own age and judge them by what is. By this procedure many characters noble in their day—new born stars of a night—are dealt very unjustly with, and faint praise is awarded when the whole heart should be in the applauding voice. This I say, not to kindle feeling favorable to giving the best relief to the excellencies of Jesus in his moral character, but as a just thought essential to the preparation necessary to appreciate the reality in Christ—what he was when he lived on the earth and made one in human households.

To this the Evangelists invite us by all that they have done. They have given no elaborate description of his character, as the orator describes the subject of his eulogy—as many attempt to picture Washington. But they do give just records of events in their day as they made part in the career of Jesus, and with unequalled simplicity, leave the doers, and what was done, to suggest thought as they may. Therefore, to find Jesus, we are forced to mingle with a strange world, and be conversant with modes of thought, customs, and opinions widely different from what makes up the character of the present age. We must travel from place to place, pausing ever and anon to hear from those who gave tone to thought and from their humblest echoes, what were the all-absorbing expectations of the nation—how all burned with hope of the coming of a conquering Messiah, kindling to deeper enthusiasm at every rumor of a mighty one being abroad, and bursting beyond all bounds as a wondrous work of exorcising was detailed. We must gather with the multitudes at the gates, hear the controversies that engage them, and contrast the breathings of humility and the high wrought foolishness of pride. We must listen to the new comer among the group, and behold the manifestations of intense interest in his story—how Jesus mingled with the humble and lowly, how he chose the poor as his apostles, how he rebuked the teachers of the law, and how he pronounced the richest blessings on the unostentatious and quiet virtues. We must remember the criticisms of the various minds, and accompany those who are determined to see and hear for themselves. As we pass on to Jerusalem, our ears must be open and we must learn as we go—sitting at the rest under the broad palm with the aged patriarch who loves to discourse of the time when wondrous tales were told of shepherds visited by an angel who told them the Messiah was born, and how he was followed by an angelic host praising God—how wise men came from the East to pay homage to the babe of a lowly woman and brought rich offerings to him—how a fearful slaughter of innocents took place, but reached not the mysterious child as the humble home where he once smiled was found empty. We must sympathize with the sadness of the countenance of 'the old man eloquent' as he tells of the mystery that enveloped the fate of the child of many hopes, and how again the desire was very strong in every city, and village, and hamlet, that the Messiah might be born in their midst. We must see the kindling of the new light in his countenance as he discourses of what he has heard when he has toiled up the mountain, caught sight of the caravan winding slowly through the valleys, and with the agility of youth leaped down to the plains and greeted the pilgrims, 'Peace be with you!' We must leave him that loves so patient a listener and long thrill with the sanctity of his fervent benediction, and press on eager to enter the holy city. We must not be a stranger in the crowds that are entering, but take part in their prejudices, passions and superstitions; with them we must ascend the winding streets, till we enter the Temple of beauty, inhale the fragrant odors of the curling clouds of incense rising from the altar, and be oppressed with the gorgeous splendor of the outward, as we gaze around till our eyes are fixed on 'the veil of blue, and purple, and crimson, and fine linen, and wrought cherubim thereon,' concealing with waving richness the glory of the inner holy, as the veil of waters hides the infinite treasures of the sea. We must cross Cedron and muse on Mount Olivet, bearing still with us the murmurs of 'the waters of Siloam that go softly.' Thus shall we furnish our minds with the facts of the age and their tendencies, and be fitted to mingle with the crowd that is shouting 'Hosanna, hosanna, to him who cometh in the name of the Highest!' Then shall we behold with reverent gaze the one object of interest, as he rises the lofty ascent, while mantles, palm branches, and flowers, are strewn around his way. Lo, he pauses on the height. The holy city lies in the distance bathed in light, glittering with beauty, lovelier and more splendid from the picturesque of the view. What a stillness pervades the mass as he halts on the brow of the hill! Will he utter the cry that shall meet ten thousand echos, as a voice amid the mountains,—and bring forth a glitter of spears in every valley, as sunbeams dart through a forest at early morning,—and cause a floating of banners, as when that same sunshine clears up the mists from the forest tops and the free wind bids them wave in their autumn richness? Again peals the Hosanna cry, responded by the crowds sweeping on to swell the mighty audience, and again there is a pause. He speaks, and what a crash of hopes there is as he speaks! He weeps as he utters the lament that the glory of Jerusalem must depart. With no shouts does he enter the city, for the enthusiasm of the multitude has been chilled. Take home to thy heart the exhibition of moral greatness given thee, O man, in him who then and there announced the ruin of temple and city, with deepest sympathy for those who were to be his murderers, bursting into tears, forgetting all the shouts of the multitude, and his own approaching agonies, in the prospective desolation of the metropolis of splendor and iniquity. We need no words to describe his moral grandeur—how in the loftiness of the majesty of mind he was elevated far—far above all, and yet possessed the tenderest sympathy by which he took part in all sorrow and embraced in his arms the babe of the lowliest peasant. There he is in his divine spirituality—forbidding us to regard the outward as aught but mere types of something within or beyond, and prize no distinctions but those of the soul. There he is with unutterable sympathy for human woe, and with a self-sacrifice as pure as a seraph's thought of God. And follow him wherever you may, you will only gather more and more light in the soul that will cast out a holy radiance, increasing the glory of goodness by revealing it clearer, till you have a sublimer vision than even the revelator had when he saw 'an angel standing in the sun.' O he is indeed—by his deeds of love, by his tears of sympathy, by his prayers of earnestness, by his manners of gentleness, by every form of amiability and moral heroism,—he is indeed the Reality of Goodness. He is our highest Ideal, and Oh, what intense anguish—what groanings that cannot be uttered, are known by many as they mourn the inadequacy of their powers to give expression in themselves of the moral loveliness in Christ. But from this sorrow, joy is born—joy in the unfolding of new energies by the putting forth of higher efforts, and joy in the deepening and wider influence of the assurance in the soul that our present Ideal shall not always grieve us with unapproachable glory.

But—let us solemnly breathe it—but the Ideal of the Good in the mind of Jesus, was as far beyond the Reality in himself, as he, as our Ideal, is beyond the Reality in us! The more perfected in goodness a soul becomes, the sublimer is its Ideal of the Good, as the more a mind becomes perfected in the sciences the more it is able to take in of the immensity of worlds.

A young and wealthy Ruler came to Jesus, and as he approached, the disciples that were gathered around the Master saw by some manifestation that he loved him. The young man came, threw himself at the feet of Christ, and called him—'Good Master!' His soul was in the words, but for wise purposes Jesus said to him—'Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is, God!' The echo rose to heaven, and through the myriads of the adoring hosts the reverent murmur ran—'God! What sublime thoughts must have lifted up his whole being at that moment! What a mighty sweep of vision was given him by which he took in the most glorious views of God's providences! He could declare God to be the Good with an emphasis to be appreciated only by the bowed cherubim before the Throne. The thought that gave birth to this was an ever-living impulse to duty. It gave him a joy which the world knew not. It prompted to any and all sacrifices needed. In the presence of the ever flowing and exhaustless Fountain of Good, he was, though in an infinitely higher sense, as the Indian chief when he first beheld 'the world of waters'—Niagara, and threw therein gladly and devoutly the most sacred and precious treasures, as an offering to sublimest beauty. In the lone mountain top—as the devout mariner on the tall mast-head gazing on the solemn stars—far away from all disturbing influences, Jesus communed with God. Thither he resorted after the long day of wearying labors and strife with an unsympathising world, and drank in strength, joy and patience for the morrow by contemplating the riches of Jehovah's love. We know not what new avenues were opened in the soul—what means of discernment were given him; but we do know that he saw through what are to us the mysteries of being, and by reading farther than we can read, loved better than we love. Lofty and pure indeed must have been his conceptions of goodness that forbade him to take to himself the title 'Good;' and that simple act should cause us to call vigorous thought into most earnest action, that we may feel more the improbability of our moral nature. It should teach us that we are essentially beings of Progress; that the unfolding of new energy in the pursuit of excellence will give the ability to bring out higher powers, and so on from age to age, from glory to glory! Brighter and more animating shall the Ideal be, and a perpetual sweetness will rejoice the soul while it sanctifies the name—The Good, to One alone. This should be the spring of our ambition, giving us the heroic in its divine purity, waking in our heart a delight to bless, that by blessing we may love more, and be in this dark world, at least, faintly, like—

'The stars that round the Sun of righteousness
In glorious order roll,
With harps for ever strung, ready to bless
God for each rescued soul.'

But ere this will be, much thought must be given to obtain a true answer as we use the young man's words—'What lack I yet?' We lack, first, a sanctified imagination to embody Jesus in all his moral excellence and religious beauty before us, and feel ourselves kneeling at his feet and gazing up into his blessed and divine countenance, as did the young man when Jesus gently chided him for calling him good. O if we cannot call him good, how can we ever expect to merit the appellation! We can at least strive to be as good as we believe our Master was; and to fire our souls with ambition worthy to be cherished, we should ponder on the lofty ideal which Jesus had of moral goodness! O it tells much for the soul's capacity for endless improvement, that the more it progresses, the more it sees to obtain—the nobler becomes the Ideal—the more glorious are the attributes of goodness—the more it hungers and thirsts after the higher fruits on the tree of life, clustering on the lofty branches in golden radiance, as though they were apples of paradise, hung there by angels! 'What lack I yet?' is the often repeated inquiry of the determinate progressive soul; and it never turns back sorrowful, for it can give of its great possessions to the poor and be still as rich as ever—for they are possessions of the soul, the riches of faith, hope, and love.

Here, then, is the next lesson to be learned as we ask what we lack in order to be true progressive disciples of Jesus Christ. We need to contrast the great possessions of the outwardly and the inwardly wealthy, and justly estimate them both.

Wealth is a good when the soul is right—when the possessor is in the kingdom; but the history of human passions, the tear-blotted record of suffering, depressed humanity, fearfully attests the heart hardening effects of wealth when gold has been loved more than man. O it is fearful to cultivate one passion to the neglect of others. All madness is but the result of this. The one thought or idea reigning pre-eminent, makes the wild zealot, the reckless enthusiast, the dreaming maniac! Man has disturbed the harmony of his passions and desires; and what is the consequence? The consequence is, society is ill-organized, endless competition is around us on every side destroying much true friendly feeling, and the highest interests of rational beings are forgotten in the hot pursuit after wealth. And at last when some have outrun others and seized on the golden prize, they sit sorrowful amid their treasures, and sad thoughts come over them as they are not happy and are forced to ask—'What lack I yet?'

They lack what alone can give real, satisfying charms to any possessions, or render happy even the most blessed of Fortune, and that is—Prosperity of soul—the right cultivation of the moral sentiments and the religious feelings and affections. Thus we may all have great possessions, greater than any of us now own, though as we take an inventory of our inward wealth, we find that we are by no means poor. Our improvable nature—our desires for happiness—our capacity to hope—our aspirations after knowledge—our affections—our sympathies,—O these are great possessions! possessions we should value and for which we should labor incessantly that we may increase their worth. They make us rich after the similitude of angels. They purchase for us, and clothe us with the beautiful garments of the spirit. They give us an influence of the best character. They can procure the means of supplying all that we lack as practical christians, for a good man has said,—‘If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him.’

Wisdom is our great lack. Wisdom that embraces the tact to apply knowledge to the practical purposes of life, as well as the possession of such knowledge. Christians differ more in their power of applying knowledge to the practical purposes of life, than in any other essential quality. Tact is the grand applier. It is as much needed by ‘the children of light,’ as by ‘the children of this world;’ and it was the possession of more of this quality, or attribute of the practical character, that our Savior had in mind when he called the latter class the wiser—wiser in their time to devise and do.

I may draw an illustration, to impress this important idea, from a well known fact in landscape or portrait painting. It is well known that all the beauty and effect of a picture often depends on the arrangement or distribution of the light. An individual was once required to sketch a rude entrance to a wood, as a trial of her skill. The wood lay in the distance, separated from the beholder by a narrow stream, over which was thrown a rustic bridge. The pupil executed the pencilled drawing according to the rules of the art, and was somewhat proud of the work. The trees stood in just proportions, the birds rested on the branches which formed a gothic arch; the opening of the wood was all carefully sketched, with the rude under-growth, the fresh and dried leaves intermingled, and a stray limb or two of a tree dropped by the farmer, made up the variety; the stream was drawn with cautious precision, the bulrushes stood upright on the side, while flowers and tangled vines and creepers strayed all along amid the grass; and then the bridge was built with prudent strokes, till it seemed faultless in its architecture and ready for the fairy foot. But after all, the drawing made no impression on the beholder—it had no effect, and the ambitious pupil was much aggrieved when her teacher pronounced a just judgment upon it. Yet she has said of the same drawing, that she has learned to look with feelings of interest almost like affection on it, as her master with a few skilful strokes of his pencil gave to it a character at once touching, beautiful, and poetic. Every thing became changed to her sight in a moment. An atmosphere was given to it, as though heaven’s own light had dawned upon it and made of the artificial a reality. The spectator was placed at once in the midst of the loveliness of a quiet day in Autumn. It was like the breath of life breathed into an exquisite statue.

Many have observed a like effect in reference to a portrait—how a different distribution of light on the canvas, or an alteration in the atmosphere with which the portrait was surrounded, affected wondrously the naturalness and impression of the likeness.

Such children of light as ‘were those artists, all christians should be, to place the graces in such a spiritual atmosphere as that they may impress the beholder and cause him at once to feel their reality.’ The power or skill to do this, is the great lack with many excellent persons in whose hearts is the true love of goodness. They present themselves in such a mingling of shadows, that the beholder cannot recognize the portrait of goodness—the likeness of virtue. They have but little tact as christian artists, and make poor impressions of their talents. And here, as valuable, I abridge the remarks of an unknown writer on tact and talent. ‘Talent is power; Tact is skill. Talent knows what to do; Tact how to do it. Talent makes a man respectable; Tact will make him respected. Talent is wealth; Tact is ready money. For the practical purposes of life, Tact carries it against Talent, ten to one. Talent makes the world wonder that it gets along no faster; Tact excites astonishment that it gets along so fast,—the secret is, it makes no false steps, it hits the right nail on the head, it loses no time, and it takes all hints. In short, it is the talent of talents, the availableness of resources, the applicability of power, the eye of discrimination, the right hand of intellect.’

How, then, shall we seek to obtain more of the power of the right applicability of means to compass christian ends—to further spiritual advancement? To this we want a straight forward and serious answer.

And, first, I reply, we lack more faith—more of an active and vigorous faith, that smiles at mountain difficulties, and breaks away or overleaps the highest barriers to improvement. We have not the trusting spirit we should have to gain strength from the recorded wonders of faith—the energies put forth by souls consecrated to high purposes, and the endurance bravely borne by those who would not yield to evil. We do not realize how the strength of a conquered tempter goes into ourselves and increases our might for nobler achievements, till at last, unharmed, we can tread on serpents and scorpions, and on the whole power of the enemy. This we all need—more of unreserved and unquestioning faith in the practicability of christian morality—at faith that will interest our hearts to the most devoted fidelity, and make the least commandment dear as the greatest, so that we shall become as the angels that hearken unto the voice of the Word, with wings unfurled to do his bidding.

We lack more directness of purpose—that decision which cannot be easily turned aside, resulting from a clear discernment of duty and a firm determination to pursue it, now and continuously. We want such a decision as the Apostles had in the presence of brutal enemies, while every form of persecution was arrayed before and around them. What was their language? The language of sober decision and lofty purpose,—

'We ought to obey God rather than men.' The divine before the human, was their rule in all things—religion, philosophy, and duty; and though to desire man's praise is good, properly restrained, yet when made the ruling passion, it becomes destructive of the beauty and nobleness of character. 'Among the chief rulers also many believed on Jesus; but because of the Pharisees they did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue; for they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God.' Miserable indecision! and quite as miserable the character that would fasten human lips with the locks of an inquisition, to prevent the free utterance of the soul's convictions.

We lack not only faith and decision of purpose, but also promptness of action. It was said of Tact that 'it loses no time,' and it is a characteristic we need. It will give a tremendous emphasis to the word Now! and will place to-morrow farther off than we generally imagine it to be. It tells us that time past cannot be recalled, and that opportunities once slighted never return. It peals in our ears—'See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise, redeeming the time, because the days are evil.'

One more essential we lack and that is—Perseverance of effort—continued and continuing progress. 'Be faithful unto death!' is the motto on the christian banner, and none other will be approved by the Captain of our salvation. We must not throw off our armor, or forget the watchwords of the camp, or the fatigues of duty. 'In peace prepare for war,' store up defences and treasure up strength. There is no turning back, but with warm and fervent faith, holy ardor, decision of purpose, and perseverance of effort, we are to press forward to the mark of the prize of our high calling in Christ Jesus. 'Endure to the end!' is the cry—to the end of earthly opportunity of doing good and being useful. And O it is indeed the true philosophy of the divine life, that the more we advance in spiritual attainments—the more we have of the experimental knowledge of doing right, the more will our souls be invigorated as by the very breath of God, and the greater will be our rejoicing in the path that shines brighter and brighter unto the perfect day.

We all know what we would be, for we cannot but desire the character of the upright and excellent. Let then the repeated question of every heart be—'What lack I yet?' And reader, turn not away from the answer, though it require of thee a task,—it may be a severe task; but be thankful that the question is answered—that the path of progress is opened; for whatever possessions we are required to relinquish, will be more than repaid by addition to our spiritual attainments and blessedness; and it will be with us as it was with one of the primitive faithful,—'What things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ. Yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, my Lord.'

'O could we learn that sacrifice,
What lights would all around us rise!
How would our hearts with wisdom talk
Along life's dullest, dreariest walk!
Some softening gleam of love and prayer
Would dawn on every cross and care.'

THE SEA OF GALILEE.

EMBOSOMED in the myrtle groves
Of heaven's most favored clime,
Land of the many memories,
Bright, sunny Palestine;
O'erarched by the ethereal blue
Of star-gemmed orient skies,
Whose very clouds are glory-tinged
With amethystine dyes;

Pure as the gushing founts that bless
A sleeping angel's dream,
Kissed by the balmy southern breeze,
Thy sparkling waters gleam,
Or murmur 'mid the rose-lipped shells
In low-voiced melody,
Thou storied of the olden time,
Bright Sea of Galilee!

Mysterious whispers tremble in Thy low and dreamy song—
Echoes of voices heard by thee
In 'days of long ago,'
When floated o'er thy azure depths,
Borne on the balmy air,
In sweet and tender cadences
The blest Redeemer's prayer!

Well may thy sunlit waves in pure
And dazzling brightness glow,—
Those pearly water-drops once laved
The toil-worn Savior's brow;
A fair memorial of his love
Shalt thou for ever be,
While waters flow, and night winds sigh,
Thou Sea of Galilee!

* * * * *

With broken mast and shivering sail,
A barque speeds o'er the wave,
The night is dark, the billows roll,
The awful tempests rave;
Yet louder than their fearful din,
Doth echo through the sky,
'Save, or we perish, Lord!' a wild
And agonizing cry!

See! light from heaven dispels the gloom,
The heaving waves are trod—

The night made glorious by thy form,
 'Deliverer,' 'Son of God!'
 'Peace, stormy minds, wild waves be still!'
 His voice came unto thee,—
 A holy calm fell o'er thy deeps,
 O Sea of Galilee!

The followers of the 'Crucified'
 Meet on the lonely strand
 To commune of his dying love,
 Who comes to join their band;
 The flowerets bend not 'neath his tread,
 None ask him, 'Who art thou?'
 Enrobed in light-Divinity
 Forth beaming from his brow!

Great joy! The Lord hath come once more
 Ere he departs above,
 To bless, with tender parting words,
 Of deep, heart-thrilling love,—
 Sweeter than earthly music notes,
 Or seraph-minstrelsy,
 The voice of God flowed o'er thy wave,
 Bright Sea of Galilee!

Calmly the deep blue waters lie
 In still and moveless rest,
 The sweet south wind hath sung itself
 To sleep upon their breast;
 Lo! mirrored there, a countless throng,
 Seraphic legions gleam;
 Through the high heavens triumphantly
 Their starry banners stream!

The glittering armies of the skies,
 With rapturous shouts have come,
 To lead the risen 'Son of God,'
 'Deliverer,' 'Conqueror' home!
 Their last sweet parting smile of love,
 Came sunbeam-like to thee,
 And lit thy clear, transparent deeps,
 Glad Sea of Galilee!

Judea's pride, long years ago,
 Was humbled in the dust;
 Sad memory lives of haughty souls
 Who made not God their trust;
 O'er the fair land that round thee lies,
 The Roman eagles flew;
 Imperial Rome's colossal sway
 Hath vanished like the dew!

The life blood of contending hosts
 The emerald sward hath dyed;
 The Crusader and Saracen
 Lie buried side by side;
 The marble shrines of Cinnareth
 Have fallen and ceased to be;—
 Time hath not dimmed thy azure wave,
 Bright Sea of Galilee!

Perished the golden temple fane
 On Zion's hill that shone,— Nought marks its faded glory, no,
 Not e'en a mossy stone!
 The Crescent and the Cross have streamed
 From Zion's bulwark walls,
 The Wolf and Conqueror by turns
 Have revelled in her halls.
 The holy chime of Sabbath bells
 Has floated through her air,
 And risen from the minaret
 The Moslem's call to prayer;
 And many a lord hath ruled the land
 So sacred once and free,
 Yet chainless still thy waters roll,
 Wild Sea of Galilee!

And oft the wanderer comes to press,
 With lingering feet the sod
 Made holy by the footsteps of
 Th' ascended Son of God,
 And while he cools the fever-heat
 By shadeless travel nursed,
 He muses of the living streams
 That quench the spirit's thirst;—

Thinks of the scenes that here transpired
 In days long past and gone,—
 Thinks of the brighter glory-beams
 Upon thee yet to dawn,
 When the new heaven and earth shall rise,
 From sin and sorrow free,
 And all thy heavenly guests return,
 Bright Sea of Galilee!

THE DINNER OF THE MONTHS.

BY HENRY NEAL.

ONCE upon a time, the Months determined to dine together. They were a long time deciding who should have the honor of being the Host on so solemn an occasion; but the lot at length fell on December; for although this old gentleman's manners were found to be rather cold upon first acquaintance, yet it was well known that when once you got under his roof, there was not a merrier, or more hospitable person in existence. The messenger too, Christmas Day, whom he sent round with his cards of invitation, won the hearts of all, although he played several mad pranks, and received many a box in return. February begged to be excused coming to the dinner, as she was in very bad spirits on account of the loss of her youngest child the twenty-ninth, who had lately left her, and was not expected to return for four years. Her objection, however, was overruled; and being seated at table between the smiling May, and that merry old fellow October, she appeared to enjoy the evening's entertainment as much as any of the company.

The dinner was a superb one; all the company having contributed to furnish out the table. January thought for the thirteenth time what he should give, and then determined to send a calf's head. February not being a very productive month, was also a little puzzled, but at length resolved to contribute an enormous cake, which she managed to manufacture in fine style, with the assistance of her servant Valentine, who was an excellent fellow at this sort of ware, but especially at bride cake. March and April agreed to furnish all the fish. May to decorate the dishes with flowers; June to supply plenty of excellent cider; July and August to provide the dessert; September a magnificent course of all sorts of game, except pheasants; which exception was supplied by October, as well as a couple of hampers of fine home-brewed ale, and November engaged that there should be plenty of ice. The rest of the eatables and all the wine were provided by the worthy host himself.

Just before sitting down to table, a slight squabble arose about precedency; some of the company insisted that the first in rank was January, and some that it was March. The host, however, decided in favor of January, whom he placed in the seat of honor, at his right hand. November, a prime, blue-nosed old maid, sat at his left, and June, a pleasant, good tempered fellow, although occasionally rather too warm, sat opposite him at the end of the table.

The dinner was admirably served. Christmas Day was the principal waiter; but the host had been obliged to borrow the attendance of some of his high guest's servants, and accordingly Twelfth-night, Shrove Tuesday and Michaelmas-day, officiated in various departments, though Shrove Tuesday was speedily turned out, for making rather too free with a prim, demure servant maid, called Good Friday, while she was toasting some hot-cross buns for the tea table.

A short, squab little fellow, called St. Thomas'-day, stood behind December's chair, and officiated as toast master; and much merriment was excited between the diminutive appearance of this man and the longest day, who stood behind June, at the other end of the table. Master Thomas, however, was a very useful fellow; and besides performing the high official duty, which we have mentioned, he drew the curtains, stirred the fire, lighted and snuffed the candles, and like all other little men, seemed to think himself of more importance than any body else.

The pretty blushing May was the general toast of the company; and many compliments were passed upon the elegant manner in which she had decorated the dishes. Old January tried to be very sweet upon her, but she received him coldly; as he was known not to be a loyal subject, and to have once stolen a crown and sceptre, and hidden them in a grave; and May, who was loyal to the back-bone, had much trouble in finding out, and restoring them. January at length ceased to persecute her with his attentions, and transferred them to November, who was of the same politics as himself, although she had not been quite as successful in supporting them. Poor May had scarcely got rid of her venerable lover, before that sentimental swain April, began to tell her that he was absolutely dying for her. This youth was one moment all sunshine and smiles, and rapture; and the next he dissolved in tears, clouds gathered upon his brow, and he looked a fitter suitor for November than for May; who having at last hinted as much to him, he left her in a huff, and entered into close conversation with September, who although much his senior, resembled him in many particulars.

July, who was of a desperately hot temper was every now and then a good deal irritated by March, a dry old fellow, as cool as a cucumber, who was continually passing his jokes upon him. At one time July went so far as to threaten him with prosecution for something he had said; but March, knowing what he was about, always managed to keep on the windy side of the law, and to throw dust in the eyes of his accusers. July, however, contrived to have his revenge; for, being called upon for a song, he gave 'The dashing White Sergeant' in great style, and laid a peculiar emphasis upon the words, 'March! March; away!' at the same time motioning to his antagonist to leave the room.

April having announced that it was raining hard, January was much perplexed as to how he should get home, as he had not brought his carriage. At one time, when he was looking very anxiously out of the window to discover if there were any stars visible, October, at the suggestion of May, asked him if he thought of borrowing Charles's wain to carry him, as he had done so great a kindness to its proprietor? This put the old fellow in such a passion, that he hastily seized his head-gear, a red cap, sallied out through the rain, and would most likely have broken his neck in the dark, had not February sent her footman Candlemas-day, after him, with a lanthorn, by whom he was guided in safety to his lodgings in Fog-alley.

On the retirement of the Ladies—February, May, August, and November—the host proposed their healths, which were drank with the usual honors; when April, being a soft spoken youth, and ambitious of distinction as an orator, began to return thanks for them in a very flowery speech; but was soon coughed down by December and March; and March, by the by, at length got into such high favor with his old enemy July, that the latter was heard to give him an invitation, saying, that if ever he came over to this side of the Zodiac, he should be most happy to see him. October told the host that, with his leave, he would drink no more wine, but that he should be glad of some good home-brewed, and a pipe. To this December acceded, and said he should be happy to join him, and he thought his friend March would do the same. March having nodded assent, they set to, and a pretty puffing and blowing they made among them. April, however, continued to drink Madeira, while June, July and September, stuck, with exemplary constancy, to the Burgundy.

After repeated summons to the drawing-room they joined the Ladies at the tea-table. November drew herself up, and affected to be quite overpowered by the smell of smoke, which March, October, and December had brought in with them; although it is well known that the old lady herself could blow a cloud as well as any of them. October seated himself by May, and said he hoped that his pipe would not have the same effect upon her, as upon her Aunt; and after having gracefully assured him that she was not at all annoyed by it, he told her that he would make her exercise her own sweet pipe before the evening was much older; which, instead of annoying, would delight every body. August, a grave stately matron of extraordinary beauty, although perhaps un peu pousse, officiated as tea-maker. Good-Friday, who by this time had recovered the fright into which Shrove-Tuesday had thrown her, handed about the toasted buns, and Swithin, a servant of July, was employed to keep the tea-pot supplied with water, which he too often did to overflowing.

Tea being over, the old folks went to cards, and the young ones, including October, who managed to hide his years very successfully, to the piano-forte. May was the Prima Donna, and delighted every one, especially poor April, who was alternately all smiles and tears, during the whole of her performance. October gave them a hunting song, which caused even the card table to be deserted, and August sang a sweet melancholy Canzonet which was rapturously encored. April both sang and played most unmercifully; but the company had an ugly trick of yawning over his comic songs, and were ready to expire with laughter at his pathetics.

At length, Candle-mas having returned from seeing old January home, his mistress February took leave of the company. April, who was a little the worse for the wine he had drank, insisted on escorting November; although she had several servants in waiting, and her road was in an opposite direction to his own. May went away in her own carriage, and undertook to set June down, who lived very near her. The road was hilly and steep, but her coachman, Ascension-day, got the horses very well to the top; and July and August both walked home, preceded by a Dog-day, with a lighted torch. September and October, who were next door neighbors, went away in the same hackney-coach; and March departed as he came, on the back of a rough Shetland poney.

SUNSHINE on flowers! fit emblem of man's youth. FR.

AN APRIL EVENING.

O who is there can help admiring
On fancy's buoyant wing,
The life-restoring, hope-inspiring,
Resistless charms of Spring.

Awakened from his winter's sleeping,
The chilled and drowsy frog
Is timidly and faintly peeping,
In yonder gloomy bog.

Now hearken! shrill and loud and longer
His notes to us he sends,
Till for a chorus, full and stronger,
Each torpid throat distends.

Still listen! a tumultuous singing
Entrances cit and boor;
Rude songs amphibious are ringing
From every fen and moor.

Nature's blithe tongue is loose, 'tis filling
Her own delighted ear
With melodies; and earth-distilling,
Fresh odors mingle here.

The clear, blue sky is stilly weeping
Its soft ambrosial dews,
And germs, long prisoned, gently steeping,
Their close-sealed coatings loose.

The rills in earth's dark mold are meeting,
And where they glistening rise,
Are moss-protected plants, secreting
Their delicate pale dyes.

The wind's rough wing is rudely o'er us
No longer passing free;
The air is mild, and will restore us
To equanimity.

The time of frost and Winter's rigor,
Passed quietly away;
And with increasing charms and vigor
Now fades the lengthening day.

This fragrance, beauty, these glad voices
Are Spring's peculiar wealth;
She flies, and smiling, she rejoices
In youth and blooming health.

With wisdom earth and air are laden,
To feed the famished mind;
From that close room come, listless maiden?
Thy languor leave behind

One moment stay! more closely round thee,
Wrap that warm mantle's fold;
There—that reviving air has found thee,
Thy cheek's bright tint has told.

Look north! see flames the pole illuming,
And then gaze on the west,
Where bold Orion, pomp assuming,
Displays his martial vest.

The stars which glitter on his shoulder,
And on his shield of hide,
Are grand heraldic honors, older
Than e'er fed kingly pride.

The Pleiades in twilight trembling,
Do twinkle this bequest,—

THE CHRISTMAS GIFT.

BY MISS JULIA A. FLETCHER.

It was Christmas Eve, and Chestnut Street was thronged as usual with a bright array of happy faces. The gray haired man, and his laughing grand children, the gay belle and the servant girl, the aristocratic and the humble,—all were there. It was a most singular and animated scene to the eye of a stranger; the brilliantly illuminated stores with their holiday suit of evergreens, the many pretty temptations which every window presented to those who were selecting their Christmas gifts, and that dense mass of human beings who were slowly passing from window to window, examining every curious toy, every decorated cake, and every article of taste or fancy which had been placed therein. It seemed as if every individual in that crowded street was content for the time to throw aside the seriousness of riper years, and be a child again. Here an illuminated hall told of the merry dance, and there of fancy fairs for the building of one church, or the paying for another. Now and then the slow moving throng were impeded by another throng as dense as around the doors of a theatre, or by the rattling cabs and omnibuses which blocked the crossings. Many a heavy heart grew light, and many a heavy purse grew lighter, amid the purchases of that evening. Gifts there were for parents, sisters, brothers, and friends, and there too were toys for the little ones who were fast asleep at home, with their stockings hung in the chimney awaiting the visit of Kriss Kringle. Many a young dreamer that night saw their welcome visitor descend the chimney with his wallet of toys, and many a listening ear heard 'the tramping' of his tiny steeds 'upon the roof.' It might have passed for a dream, however, had not the well filled stockings in the morning-borne witness that Kriss Kringle had been there.

Now turn we to a dimly-lighted room in the third story of a dingy looking brick house in George Street. It is small in dimensions, but the bed which stands in one corner, and the small cook stove which occupies the middle of the room, show that it is at once both chamber and kitchen. But the room is not destitute of comfort, for a coarse rag carpet covers the floor, and the small pine table which stands near the stove, is covered with a neat white cloth, on which is spread the evening meal. It is simple enough to suit the most abstemious taste, but I cannot pity the partakers, for there is a loaf of nice light bread, a slice of real Philadelphia-looking butter, and a pitcher of the delicious Schuylkill water. There are no curtains to the window, but the close shutters make the room look so warm and home-like, that we almost forget the deficiency. By the table sits an aged female reading from a well-worn copy of the Scriptures, while by her side, a young girl is diligently sewing. The one small candle which burns thereon, sufficeth for them both, and happier are they than many who sit listlessly by their astral lights, or move where the brilliant camphene but showeth a countenance beaming with the excitement of artificial pleasure.

They are waiting for some one who is to share their frugal repast, for the table is laid as for three. The old lady hath laid aside the holy book, for it is printed in small type, and her eyes are wearied, but the calm smile which resteth upon her lip, showeth that its spirit still abideth with her. She hath never been rich in worldly goods, for in poverty was she born, in poverty hath she lived near three-score and ten years, and in all human probability in poverty she will depart. But she hath treasures many and priceless, laid up where moth and rust corrupt not, and she feels that she is richer in her poverty than many of earth's votaries in their wealth. Yet sorrow hath oft-times visited her spirit, and she hath bowed in agony beneath the weight of affliction. She was a widow in early life, yea, a poor and friendless widow, and though the bitterness of desolation was in her heart, as she bowed over the death-couch of the loved, and saw the light go out upon the shrine whereon her earthly hopes and affections had been laid, yet for her child's sake, she still struggled on. She pressed her last kiss upon the cold lips of the dead, she expended of her scanty means to procure a decent burial, and then with a woman's all trusting, all loving earnestness of heart, she turned unto the living. She wore no mourning weeds, but the veil and the mantle of mourning had fallen upon her spirit, and through the forty long years of her widowhood, she has cherished the memory of her early love.

She was an excellent seamstress, and by the most unceasing exertion, she procured a subsistence for herself and the fair child who had been spared unto her, and more delicately was it nurtured than many a child of rank and wealth. The voice of repining was never heard in her humble abode. When the fire burned brightly upon her hearth, and the frugal meal was spread upon her board, she blessed God in the fullness of her heart, and murmured not that days and nights of wasting toil were necessary to procure them, and when employment failed, and that board was no longer spread for lack of food, and the fire waned dim for lack of fuel, she gave her last piece unto her child, and pressed it closer to her heart for warmth, yet the prayer, 'Give us this day our daily bread,' arose no less trustingly.

Year followed year, and as the cheery laugh of the little Alice was heard in the widow's dwelling, and her tiny fingers learned to share her toil, the mother's smile was less frequently dimmed by tears, and her heart seemed to have lost a shade of its holy sadness. A blessing ever seemed to follow that sweet child. Her happy song rang out all day long as she sat at her needle-work, and she would awaken in the starry night with the half-murmured fragment of some favorite air upon her lips. Life was all bright to her, for all things reflected the light of her own joyous spirit. It was no marvel that the lonely widow should almost idolize the child as she grew in loveliness by her side. As time flew by, and the fair child became the graceful maiden, the mother's love grew deeper in its intensity until it seemed to constitute her very being. All light, all hope, all joy seemed centred in that one only thought, and when she knelt in prayer, it was but to return thanks for that one blessing. She was still her own, still the same loving, gentle being who had nestled in her arms in infancy; and the widow felt that amid all her trials she had been kindly dealt with. And when she gave her only treasure unto one she deemed worthy of her, and made her home with them, she felt that an home of rest had indeed arrived. During ten years her cup was filled with peace. She was no longer lonely, for the new name of 'grand-mamma,' was hers, and the little prattlers who clustered around her, left no room in her heart for solitude.

The summer of 1833 arrived, and that fearful scourge of the human race, the Cholera, ravaged the city, filling nearly every house with mourning. Alice was one of its earliest victims. Mercifully was she taken from a most fearful trial, for the morrow's sun looked upon the lifeless corpse of her husband; and ere a week had passed, three of her children had gone to rest with her. Mysterious are the dispensations of Providence! That aged one was spared amid this desolation to perform the last sad offices of love for those unto whom she had looked to smooth her own death-pillow. She laid them by the side of her husband, and gladly would the wearied one have sought a rest with them, but she had now a new duty to perform in life. There were still two young, helpless beings dependant upon her care, and she still struggled on. Mary, the eldest, was a lovely girl of nine years, and had she not been already her grandmother's pet, her likeness to her mother would have endeared her amid this bereavement. Edwin was a little lisping curly-haired child of three, and his continual entreaty, 'Ganma, do let mame come home,' was almost agony unto her soul. His mother had indeed gone home, home to her Savior, home to her God. Again was the aged widow compelled to encounter the trials of the world alone. Yet she bowed not in desolation as when the angel of sorrow first came to trouble the waters of love in her young heart. It seemed as though she had gained a strength and firmness of mind, which had never before been hers. The mourner of three-score was to watch over and to cherish the child of three. Well did she strengthen herself for the task. She would live to be their guide and protector. She would be father, mother, friend, all unto them, for they were the children of the loved who were with God. Mary was old enough to aid her in taking charge of Edwin, and with the aid of the little which had been left at their father's death, she contrived to earn a scanty livelihood by coarse sewing, knitting, and at her equally humble employments.

A kind lady who lived near, offered to give the children some instruction during her hours of leisure, and a sad trouble was thus taken from her heart, the fear that they must grow up almost in ignorance. As Mary advanced in years her resemblance to her mother grew more perfect, she wanted but the same merry smile, to almost persuade her grand-mother that she had won her own dear Alice back. But there was ever something in the calm seriousness of her countenance and the subdued softness of her tone, which told of the severe trial through which her young spirit had passed. Perhaps it was fortunate that the little Edwin had been too young to know the extent of his loss, for his buoyant and happy temperament were often necessary to give cheerfulness to their dwelling. He is now a manly lad of thirteen, and his intelligence and activity have procured him a place in a store which enables him to share with his sister in relieving their grand-mother's labors. It must be him whom they are expecting this evening, and for whom their supper is waiting.

He has just entered, and the large packet which he holds in his hand tells the reason of his delay. 'Grand-mother, I have brought you a new Bible, you know yours is so worn and the print so small, you can hardly read it.' Her age-dimmed eyes are still more dimmed by tears as she takes the gift, for she feels that God hath given her a rich blessing amid her poverty, in those loving beings who have been spared to sooth her declining years. The lad turneth now to his sister, and his arms are entwined around her as he whispers, 'Mary, I had only money to purchase the Bible, I have brought you nothing but love.' The maiden answereth not, but the unwonted smile which lighteth up her pale countenance, contrasting so strangely with that sudden tear, tell us that to her a brother's love is the most welcome Christmas gift.

MORNING.

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

NIGHT lifts her sable mantle from the earth!
 A faint soft light now streaks the eastern skies
 With roseate hues, and each bright star has fled.
 The day doth break. Deep silence reigns around,
 In nature's courts, and in the homes of men.
 A solemn spell seems cast o'er earth and heaven,
 When day and night thus meet. How doth the world
 Greet this pure hour? The laborer will go
 With merry song to ply his daily task,
 Which if it leadeth not to Mammon's shrine,
 Grants a supply far better, health and peace,
 And a contented mind; a happier lot
 Than his, who on his downy pillow press'd,
 The morning hours doth waste in ease and sloth;
 And who has spent his youth in gaining wealth
 That wants the power to bless, for in the search
 The claims of heart, mind, soul, and health were stilled!
 The suffering sick, who in the depth of night
 Sank into sleep, now raise their drooping heads,
 And faintly welcome, and yet dread the day.
 Affliction's children, who in rest have sought
 Forgetfulness of wo, and who perchance
 In dreams have clasped again the loved and lost,
 Now wake to tears and mourning. Are there not
 Some happy beings that do greet the day
 In full and joyous feeling?

Few there are
 Whom earth calls blest, and fewer truly so,
 For in each cup is mingled joy and wo—
 And only those who drink and are content
 To suffer if it be God's will, and then,
 Firm in the path of duty to press on,
 Can e'er be termed the wise and blest.

THE VALUE OF MAN.

It was at the close of a fine afternoon in Summer that I reached the village. I had arrived on the day before. I now went forth to examine my new home. Having lived, for the most part, in the city, the streets of the village seemed very quiet, almost lonely; but when I did meet an individual, he compensated for that by the attention which he paid me, no one passing without a brief salutation, while in one or two instances I was welcomed to my new abode by a courteous speech.

This gave rise to some reflections; for as I walked leisurely forward towards the end of the village, I could not avoid remembering how little notice men took of each other in large cities. Men are as valuable in town as they are in the country. Yet even persons of the same caste, or station in society, pass each other without seeming to be sensible that a human being has been so near them, while in the country, the squire does not pass a common laborer without a smile and a nod. As we progress towards the interior, this state of things gives way to something like a recognition of the common relationship of mankind. When you reach the country, you do not pass any person without receiving a salutation. But when you have penetrated far interior: when you have reached the forests of the West, you find yourself alone; and then if you chance to meet a traveler, you deem it an adventure. Although you never met before, you stop to converse like old friends. You tell each other some parts of your history, and you part, at least, with feelings of regret. If you, at a future time, fall in with the man whom you met afar from the haunts of your kind, you feel an interest in him; you converse with him like a familiar friend.

These things prove the worth of man to his fellow. We do not find out the worth of our fellow-creatures until we are cut off from their society. They are like the inestimable gift of cold water, which we heed not when it flows in rivers before us, but whose value we know when we seek it in vain.

Let us imagine ourselves the only man—the only human being in the whole world. I stand upon a rock in the midst of the plain, and look around me. I am entirely alone. I see the distant forest whose boughs I know to be filled with birds, the sea with its multitude of scaly inhabitants, and the hills on which roam the unfettered brutes. But no one of them all resembles me in form. No one of them appears desirous of approaching me. They all have their mates and their companions, but I have none. I suppose that I am a nondescript, the 'forlorn and abandoned one' for whom there is no sympathy and no companionship. I retire to my solitary cave to hide myself from the other beings who are so much more happy than I, and who appear to hold me in contempt. Years pass on, and I daily walk abroad over the earth, to see all that is to be seen—to seek for novelties to beguile me of my loneliness. I feel that I am solitary; and yet the idea of another such being as myself in the world never enters my mind. Having always been alone, the idea of finding a companion of my own form and nature would appear wild, marvellous, and absurd, even if the thought should by any means enter my mind. Early one morning, I set out on my usual tour. I have not walked far, before I see, at a distance, a something which resembles the stump of a tree. As I approach, I perceive that it moves. It is then alive! I have never seen an animal of that form before. I hasten toward it. It perceives me! It lifts its head and seems surprised. It moves towards me, and its motions and its manner seem to be intelligent like my own. As we draw together, I become convinced that it is of my own kind. How strange! how miraculous; What does it mean that I who am single and alone—who thought I belonged to a pattern which had no similitude in the earth—what can it mean that here is one who suddenly appears, the image of myself. Am I a double being, and is this my other half? He pauses and seems to be under the influence of the same feelings and speculations as myself. I walked up to him, and lay my hand on his hand. He also handles me. He speaks—he utters an intelligent idea! The shock of mind meeting mind, for the first time, creates a strange and bewildering sensation. He has uttered the same idea which was in my own mind. I seem to lose my personal identity, for this other being is another me: he thinks my thoughts. I supposed my thoughts were my own, and that something in me which reflected and reasoned, was in no other being, for surely this is myself, and this other man cannot use me to think with. I have seen the beasts and birds mate and herd together. They were near each other, and were alike in form—but here is a very different companionship, for this being appears to be myself in his thoughts.

Gradually we enter into conversation. We listen keenly and reverently to the words uttered by each other, wondering how we should both have thoughts so much alike; and whenever the one utters something which the other does not agree with, the hearer anxiously desires to know his reasons for his opinion, and does not presume to contradict it unless he has patiently heard all that can be said on the subject, as he expects to get some new ideas from this being who thinks, and who may be correct in his opinion.

I am no longer alone. I now have one who sympathizes with me, who shares my joys and sorrows, my hopes and fears, and the only dread I have is, that I may lose my companion. I now understand the worth of man to his fellow.

Two years pass on in this manner. At that time, we set out on a journey. After travelling a few days, we are surprised by the sight of another human being. We are overjoyed at this discovery. He comes bounding towards us and grasps our hands with rapture. He too supposed himself alone, and he now examines us critically to see if we are really like himself. We soon become acquainted, and we three believe ourselves to be the only human beings on earth. We are very glad of each other's society—yet we do not experience that peculiar anxiety about each other's welfare, that we did when there were only two of us. At last we fall in with a town, during our rambles, where are one or two thousand inhabitants. We rush forward into the streets of the town, where we find men, women, and children. We greet the inhabitants with enthusiasm. They cautiously return our salutation. We go into a shop where we see a variety of fruits. We begin to eat of all that we see. At once a loud outcry is raised. We look up with astonishment, and are then informed that those oranges, those apples, those figs which we have eaten, belong to one man, and that we must pay money for what we have eaten.

'Belong to one man!' I exclaim—'I thought they grew on trees! Will you not show me how to make oranges and apples?'

'Fools! barbarians!' they exclaim; 'these things do grow on trees; but the trees belong to one man, and the seller of these things has paid for the privilege of gathering them.'

'That is strange!' we reply, 'for if we had trees, we would give of the fruit to every man who is hungry.'

'No, no, you are not civilized,' they reply, 'every one must look out for himself. You must have property of your own, or you must not eat or drink.'

We are surprised and shocked at this unkindness, and we conclude that these men never lived alone, or they would have had a fellow feeling for their species. Being willing to live in town, we bestirred ourselves to learn some business, and soon became as selfish as the rest. We no longer looked upon men as necessary to our happiness, for they were so plenty that we set but little value upon them. Now, instead of calmly listening to their views, we could quarrel with them because they differed from us in opinion, and we could form associations and despise those who did not belong to our own particular circle.

While reflecting on these things, I reached my boarding-place. A clumsy ploughman accidentally ran against me, as I opened the gate, and soiled my ruffles. I was about to use a harsh expression, when the thought struck me that if I were alone in the world, I should be glad to meet this uncultivated specimen of humanity; and so I passed silently by, convinced that no man, though ever so faulty, or so humble, is to be despised.

THE VICTIM OF MESMERISM.

I VERILY believe I am the most miserable man alive, and in hopes of receiving sympathy from the public I have concluded to give my sufferings a voice. A few years since I accidentally wandered into a lecture room where a gentleman was enlightening his audience upon the subject of Mesmerism; and proving his theory by wonderful experiments, which, for aught I could see, were honestly performed. Witchcraft in its palmiest days, the marvellous feats of goblins and ghosts, haunted houses and prophetic warnings, were nothing to the deeds done by the mesmerizer and his sleeping victim, the patient. Victim, I may well call her, for I would about as soon have submitted to the rack of the inquisition, as to have endured the torments inflicted upon the poor girl merely to gratify the spectators by proving that she must have been in a magnetic sleep, or she would show signs of agony.

I am not sure that the subject would have taken so strong a hold upon my mind but for one painful circumstance which attended my first acquaintance with it. When the lecture was over, instead of departing with the crowd, I lingered, I know not why, but I wish to Heaven I had not. I believe my evil star was in the ascendant—I can account for it no other way. The lecturer advanced to the very spot where I stood, and regarded me for a moment with fixed attention; then, with a bow which he intended should be very gracious, but which seemed to me very demoniacal, he said, 'Sir, you would make an excellent subject!' Had a serpent stung me, I could not have felt greater horror. 'God forbid!' I exclaimed, and hurried from the hall as if pursued by a legion of mesmerisers anxious to transfix and paralyze me, and then subject me to the slow torture I had just seen administered.

I reached the boarding house in which I had been pleasantly located for a few months, and immediately retired; but sleep came not to my excited brain. The moment I closed my eyes, there stood the lecturer by my bedside gazing intently upon me, and performing the manipulations with surprising rapidity and perseverance. I buried my face in my pillow, and pressed my fingers upon my closed lids, but to no purpose; those glaring eyes and waving hands shone through all impediments; and at one time I half resolved to leave my bed and beg a lodging with one of the boarders, but unwilling to betray the source of my torment, I lay still. Tired nature could endure no more, and towards morning I feel asleep, but the breakfast bell awoke me with such a start, that I found myself standing in the middle of the floor. In my dream I had gone back to that fatal lecture room, and was myself the subject seated in that horrible chair. I thought a kind hearted gentleman was approaching me with a loaded pistol, which he was to discharge as near my ear as possible without wounding the flesh, but totally unmindful of the chance by which I might be rendered deaf for life; and was on the point of firing when the bell awoke me from my dreadful fright. The real and imaginary so blended that it was some minutes before I could believe that my sense of hearing was unimpaired, and that the scene that had so terrified me was but a vision of sleep, caused by over-excitement the night before.

I may as well add that my horror of fire-arms was always so great, that nothing could ever induce me to touch a gun, and even the pop-gun with which I was furnished in my boyhood, I speedily gave away. I could never endure a shock of any kind. The sight of an electrical machine or galvanic battery could at any time throw me into a perspiration; and I would not have cared if a peal of thunder had lasted all day, provided it increased and decreased gradually. I once called on a dentist to have a tooth extracted. What induced me to such an act of heroism, I cannot tell, but I shall never forget the smile with which the dentist regarded me when I asked him to draw it slowly. The fiend promised, but if he had been doing it on a wager, he could not have done it quicker. Lightning was nothing to it. I have never lost another tooth save by slow decay.

At the breakfast table one after another inquired for my health, and if I had just stepped from my coffin, I could scarcely have looked paler. I ought to inform my reader that I had inherited from my father twenty thousand dollars. I had been an only child, and the pet of a sick mother, who, through fear that I was as delicate as herself, immured me in her own sick room and watched me with unbounded solicitude; so that feeling unwilling to grapple with the rough world, I acquired a due hatred of commercial life, and concluded to study. What shall I study? then became a question of paramount importance. The law first presented itself, but a vision rose before me of my diminutive figure and pale face, in a crowded courtroom. I saw the finger of derision pointed at me—I felt the blood mount till my cheeks were of carnation hue,—and then I imagined myself stuttering unintelligible sentences, until the vision became too painful, and I banished it forever. I was never wild enough even for a moment, to suppose myself a doctor, for I would not bleed a man if every drop of blood could be transformed into a diamond of the first water. There was one avenue left—the ministry, and as the sacredness of the calling would at first shield me from open contempt, I hoped to be able to face a congregation at some future time without trepidation. The day which succeeded the memorable morning when I sprung from my bed in such haste, mistaking the breakfast bell for a double barreled pistol, was the one which I had appointed to visit my only uncle, and read to him my first sermon. He was quite a literary old gentleman, and rather eccentric, but I thought much of his judgment, though he generally handled me rather roughly, and often told me that he wished I had not a dollar in the world, that I might be obliged to toil, and then I might become a man. What an insinuation! However, my pride was touched, and I determined to show him that I could and would make my brain work; so to his house I hastened. I found him in his easy chair, his cat slumbering at his feet, and the newspapers which he loved next, scattered upon a table drawn towards him. He took my manuscript, and as he approached the end of the last page, while my heart was beating postmen's double knocks against my unfortunate ribs, he said, 'Pshaw! Timothy, have you any idea of turning mesmeriser? I'll venture my Tabby here, that you could put any one asleep in reading five pages of such tame trash.' He gazed at me a moment, and then burst into a fit of uncontrollable laughter. 'No, no! Timothy, that is too ridiculous, but you would make a capital subject—supposing you let yourself to some showman. I half thought last evening, the lecturer was making a bargain with you, for I saw you conversing as you went out.' Shades of all martyrs! I could bear no more. I thought but of getting away, and in my haste, I sent Tabby yelling into one corner, my chair turned a somerset, and I reached the next block before I ascertained that my hat had not accompanied me, so I was compelled to return. 'Well,' said my uncle, 'another such egress and I shall speak for a straight jacket. Your sermon was not so bad as it might have been, take it and try again.' Alas! he little knew of how small consequence that sermon had become. The dreadful night-mare that was constantly pursuing me, I felt would work my ruin.

I have said that my boarding house was a good one—a rare commodity—but even this I was compelled to leave. One day at dinner, to my utter dismay, a near neighbor broached the hated subject, (I had religiously abstained from uttering the word.) Not wishing to draw attention, I remained, though my appetite was gone. My neighbor had joined a class, and was learning to perform the mysterious operation. In a tone so merry that it grated on my ear, he said, 'I should like to perform some experiments in the parlor this evening, for the amusement of all.' Amusement! I should as soon think of holding a levee in a grave-yard, as of deriving any pleasure from this diabolical mystery. My neighbor turned to me. 'Mr. W., I think I could mesmerise you—are you willing that I should try?' Willing! I would as soon consent to be served up on a dissecting board for the edification of young physicians. A mildew had passed over my Eden, and retreating to my chamber, I literally crushed my clothes into trunks, then I sought the landlady, paid her a fortnight's board in advance, and before night, I had taken lodgings in a hotel at the other extreme of the city.

I am almost convinced that the world is in league against me. I cannot endure that a pair of eyes should more than glance at my face. I met an old friend the other day, whom I had not seen for months. We grasped each other warmly by the hand, when he exclaimed, 'My dear Timothy, you look very unwell, what is the matter?' He would have looked sick also, if he had suffered what I have for years past. 'You need more of the magnetic fluid Tim, why don't you get mesmerised?' He had imbibed the mania! Had he recommended a shower bath of lava fresh from an irruption of Vesuvius, I would have complied as willingly.

I cannot attend church with any feeling of security, for, just before me sits a large, strong man, whom I am convinced has evil designs upon me, for I encounter his gaze whenever I look in his direction. In the rail-road car, the steamboat, the lecture room and even in the public street, my peace of mind is at the disposal of all I meet, and all seemed disposed to destroy it. The crowning sorrow remains to be told. I had long loved a beautiful girl, in temperament, manners and appearance, my very opposite. I resolved to offer her my hand and fortune—my heart was hers already. On a beautiful evening, arrayed in my best, I called at the house and resolved not to leave it until I was an accepted or disappointed lover. Ellen was more radiant than ever, and enjoying uncommonly high spirits. Her wit was more brilliant than I had ever known it, and led on by an irresistible impulse, I had become almost as frolicsome as herself. Suddenly she started up in an ecstasy of delight, laid her hand upon my arm, and looked into my face with a bewitching smile; when she said, in a tone of voice full of glee, 'Sit down, Timothy, and I will mesmerise you, for Mr. D. says I have the power.' Had she been a boa-constrictor just imported from the wilds of Asia, I could not have shaken her off with a more real shudder. I made a hasty apology, and left the house. I have never touched even the side-walk before that house since.

Kind hearted, benevolent reader, can you suggest a remedy for my almost hopeless sufferings? If not, give me the boon of sympathy, for I can scarcely revive courage enough to leave my room, and even there I am always haunted by that lecturer and his insensible victim.

MEMORIES.

BY CHARLOTTE.

OLD friend, dost thou remember the sunny days of yore,
When nature, ever to our eyes a face of beauty wore?
When meadows green or snow-clad hills alike our heart's could warm?

For we were blithe and gay, alike, in sunshine or in storm.

And do you not remember the humble village school,
And the kind old dame who governed it, with mild and gentle rule?

And how we used to loiter and con our lessons o'er,
Beneath the spreading branches of that ancient sycamore?

Do you remember, playmate, how the self-same path we trod,

As each successive Sabbath came, unto the house of God?
Through that green lane where stately elms upreared on either side,

And spread their massive arms above the brooklet's mirror-tide,—

The merry brook that singing went, through all the long,
bright hours,

Whose banks, in spring and summer-time were brodered thick with flowers;—

O dear its simple music was to my untutored ear,
And bright as dreams of fairy-land did every scene appear.

Do you remember the old church with ivy over-run,
And the snug old-fashioned parsonage, that seemed the gaze to shun?

For its front was almost hidden from the careless passer's view,
By the clambering vines that o'er it in rich profusion grew.

Do you remember too the day when that young preacher came,
The tidings of a full and free salvation to proclaim?
And oh how eagerly we hung upon his every word,
And felt that he indeed possessed the spirit of the Lord?

Do you remember how we wept the day the pastor died?
And how we sought his lowly grave, and planted flowers beside

The humble mound, and watered them with many a shower of tears,
And how carefully and tenderly we nurtured them for years?

Do you remember the old church-yard, where so many dear ones lie?

It used to be our favorite haunt in pleasant days gone by—
And oft I've prayed, that when at length, life's cares are all forgot,

You and I may rest together, love, within that quiet spot!

TEMPERANCE AND THE 'PRIVILEGED CLASSES.'

WE present an outline report of an Address made by Rev. SAMUEL OSGOOD of Providence, at one of the meetings of the City Society. He was requested to speak to a resolution which commended the Temperance Cause to the attention; sympathy and co-operation of the 'Privileged Classes,' and his address was just in thought and beautiful in language and expression. The outline here given was published in the 'Gospel Messenger,' and was made from memory and from a few notes taken down in a dark place, and quite imperfect. We do not pretend to give the reverend gentleman's language, but his ideas, and regret that we cannot give adequate time to re-write the sketch. It is, we are aware, a poor outline, but we are confident it attributes to the speaker no sentiment which he did not utter. He deserves a gold medal, from metal seven times tried, for his frankness in the address. We cannot but regard it as presenting an important branch of the great subject, and one which is too little discussed. We trust our readers will deem the space occupied by the following sketch as well filled, and that the ideas of the speaker will awaken fruitful thought and energetic action. Marshall and Parker have eloquently borne their testimony in reference to the same matter, and we trust the time is not distant when 'wine drinking' and every form of 'fashionable' inebriation, will be regarded and treated as disreputable. There is a need of much speech on this subject, for we find that some influential journals have lately approved the ridiculous custom that bids the ladies at a public festival to depart, that wine may be brought in. This custom was discontinued by a society with a great name in New York, but observed again at the last anniversary. Abominable! If wine drinking is not opposed to all refinement of feeling, speech and action, wherefore are the ladies required to leave as the bottles enter? A fine sort of a gentleman is he who prefers a bottle to a lady, and then toasts in bumpers, 'Woman!' Shame on him.

Mr. Osgood remarked, in substance, that he had been requested to touch upon the claims of the Temperance cause on the more 'privileged classes' in society—doubtless employing the phrase according to common usage, and his idea was well understood, everybody knew who were meant. He observed that in carrying out our principles, and aiding the movements of the age, we ought to be as catholic as possible, and follow out duty wherever the principle of duty taught us to go and act. In the great movement of the Washingtonians, he recognized the spirit of the Gospel, and its advance promoted the diffusion of the influence of christianity. It, therefore, had claims on all; but he should address himself particularly to one portion of its claims—its claims on the privileged classes to set aside the use of all that intoxicates; and he should speak of the duty which the privileged classes owe to the Temperance cause.

And, first, he would remark, that Intemperance has more power in its disguised or veiled forms, than when openly exhibited. Such was now the general sentiment in favor of Temperance, that the exhibition of the reeling inebriate in our streets, has rather a moral influence. There is no danger that our children will admire the beauty of the physiognomy, or the grace of the movements of such an one, for there is in the sight enough to waken disgust. But there is danger in the example, the habits of those whose refined manners and cultivated intellect connect them with the influential, but whose morals ally them to the inebriate.

The privileged classes owe a duty to the Temperance cause, because they are thus privileged. They have a commanding influence, and should exert that influence for the highest good. They rule the manners, and through them the morals of society. It is a trite remark, but will bear repetition, that was made by a certain writer, 'Let me write the songs of a people, and I care not who makes the laws.' He would not say that, but he would say—give me the power to mould the manners of a people, and I will not wish to control the laws. There is no mistaking the influence of the manners of the privileged classes, and laugh as we may at the idea, yet they do shape the general manners of a people. The practices in the saloons of Fashion do exert a greater influence on morals, than the enactments of our Legislative halls. It is this privilege which presents a duty which the privileged classes owe to the Temperance cause, to mould the customs to its requirements.

Again. The fact of their privilege implies that they have not the excuses which the less fortunate can put forth plausibly as apologies for intemperance. They have not the pressing weights of poverty on them, and are not called to those stern strugglings with evil which weaken so many; and therefore when victims of Intemperance, they have all the grossness, without the excuses of the less fortunate inebriate.

He, therefore, would lay down the only safe and consistent principle for all to observe—Total abstinence from all that intoxicates. All the reasons which bear against the use of distilled spirits, bear against the more delicate forms of inebriation. We cannot be consistent in pleading and acting in behalf of the cause of Temperance, and then in the social circle or elsewhere partake of the wine cup. The example will do more than the professions.

Again. The peculiar dangers of the privileged classes furnish another important consideration. The enemy approaches under the disguised forms of pleasantness, so gradual that his grasp is fixed ere any are conscious that he is near. Let us go out and stand before the homes of the affluent, and call up their family histories. Some melancholy facts will be recalled of those whose countenances have changed from bearing the expression of a noble mind and pure affections, and who have gone down to a drunkard's grave. The practice is carried farther by the child than the parent, and that which is deemed safe by the father in reference to himself, is seen to be destructive in its influence upon the son. And who has not seen the evils of the more delicate or disguised forms of inebriation, who has been familiar with life in our seminaries of education! How many wrecks has the wine-power made! How many noble hearted fellows have been degraded by the conviviality which they deemed promotive of kindness of feeling and good nature!

The speaker added that he believed that the dangers to which the privileged classes were exposed, were fearful on account of other excesses to which intemperance from the wine cup led, and which it increased. Gluttony and wine bibbing go together, and excess in drinking is often consequent on efforts to prevent injurious effects from excess in eating. A change, as demanded by Temperance, would produce a change in the whole economy of the table, and preserve those whose god is their appetite.

It is of the highest importance that we be consistent in example—that we do not sanction in a more elegant form that which we condemn in its grosser forms. Too frequently the quaint remark of Luther has direct and just application, 'We are willing to curse the black devil, and let the white devil go, whereas the black devil is only the white devil with his coat changed!'

These dangers and others which are connected with them, show the important duties which the privileged classes owe to the Temperance cause. Why are they not more faithful? Why is this cause so completely taken out of their hands? There are reasons for this want of interest and absence of effort, and some of these he would briefly notice.

The first to which he would allude was The Power of Fashion. He could not but recall a remark of the head of the French police, Fouché, in reference to a certain person's offence—It was worse than a crime, it was a mistake. And so now we might use a common opinion, and severely censure an act by—It was worse than wrong, it was unfashionable. Hence the absurdest customs are apologized for by the remark—O, it is fashionable. The speaker added that he verily believed that were it the fashion to have opium carried round in some disguised form at our parties, or any similar poisonous drug, it would be sufficient excuse for participating in the use thereof—It is the Fashion! We are led by Fashion, notwithstanding our loud boasts of freedom; and as in the cut of a coat or the shape of a bonnet, so with morals—the Fashion rules. It should not be so; and when Fashion comes in contact with morals, turning the devotee away from that which is right, just and good, we should speak out—it is not a trifling matter, and should not be lost amid the common talk about Fashion.

Now we do know that in consequence of the form of inebriation which the power of Fashion aids in perpetuating, that we can scarce attend a large party, without perceiving some one much the worse for the kind hospitalities of the host. And this is not confined to the males, but reaches to those of the other sex. There is a brightness of the cheek which comes not from nature's element of beauty, and a fire of the eye that comes not from the glow of soul. The Physician could tell us stories which would reveal startlingly the evils of such inebriation in the sickness resulting from the excess which Fashion still countenances.

Again. Another reason why more has not been done by the privileged classes for the cause of Temperance, is to be found in the pretension that the possession and use of inebriating drinks are a matter of refinement. Some now speak of their delicate wines, with as much pride as the nobles of old spoke of their family escutcheon; and at the dinner party the variety is brought forth for criticism and praise. Now, the speaker said, he cared not whether the evil came from the distillery or the most famous vineyard, all we have to do is to mark the effect of the drink on the company. Just in proportion to the indulgence will it be seen that the spirit of the bottle is against the spirit of refinement; and how often does it lead on to practices at the festive board of which a heathen would be ashamed. He thought the common invitation to a dinner party ought to be amended so as to read after the complements to attend the dinner, 'and will do his best to return him to his home as near a brute as possible.' This is a matter, he remarked, for the sober consideration of young men, that the wine-pride may not be considered by them as a mark of refinement.

Again. Another reason for inefficiency, is in the supposition that the use of inebriating drinks promotes good feeling. Now there is none too much good feeling in the world, and did he suppose that the use of rum or wine would really promote the flow of good feeling, the speaker would say, 'Drink rum, drink wine.' But facts will not admit of such a supposition. Try the experiment. Let two young men who are intimate with and ardently attached to each other, set out with the idea that inebriating drinks promote good feeling. Can we not recall instances in real life to show us how this practice would change them—how it makes the heart sensual and selfish, till at last the victims will stoop to the meanest acts to obtain new supplies for farther indulgence. Students in college have been known to borrow money of their poor classmates, that which they could ill afford to lose, and which the borrowers no more thought of repaying, than the grave thinks of giving up its dead. The feeling caused by inebriating drinks is no more to be taken for real good feeling, than the hectic on the cheek of the consumptive is to be taken for the glow of genuine health. People should be more social. They should live as though they believed there is a blessed rill in our being, that can impart vivacity and joy without the aid of artificial and ruinous stimulants. The true temperance man is the most generous and true hearted man; the readiest to do a favor, and promote genuine good feeling.

Look around creation and see how joyous all things are but man. Why, when the winds are rude and the storm fills the air with rain, do we not call the birds in, and pour a little brandy down their throats to keep them lively? They would know better than to receive it, for their joy is in obeying those instincts of their being which keep them from all but the simple elements of life. When the children return from school with a cloud upon the brow and a weight upon their spirits, why does not the mother resort to the wine cup to cheer them? She knows better than that. She knows that God has placed in their hearts that which can be awakened to restore to them the buoyancy of joy and bring back the sunshine of happiness to their countenance.

If these things are so, what is the duty of the privileged classes? They should exert their influence to make all ideas of Fashion, Refinement and Pleasure to harmonize with the requirements of Temperance; and be ever consistent not to countenance in its more elegant forms that which they condemn when exhibited more grossly.

'LIKE THE FLOWERS HE PERISHED.'

A YEAR or two since, I met in my daily walk a young boy of exquisite beauty. His complexion was brilliantly white, and his large blue eyes had that mingled expression of tenderness and playfulness so bewitching in the young. His high expansive forehead gave token that the spirit within was worthy of its beautiful tenement. Perhaps the observer's eye was first attracted by his long, golden, curling hair, which fell over cheeks, neck, and shoulders, and looking in the breeze so much like stray sunbeams, that I longed to bear one away as a talisman against darkness. Again in his coffin I saw that withered flower and o'er the flannel robe, by which wounded affection still strove to guard the faded form, those rich curls fell even as a week or two before they swept the gaudier robes of living childhood.

Dust unto kindred dust—
The spirit to its Maker, is the doom
Of those in whom we fain would place our trust,
And grasp as treasures from the opening tomb!

But when the young depart,
When untried spirits softly spread the wing,
We feel that angels win the tender heart,
Lest it should faint for heaven's eternal spring!

Oh! who would stay the flight
Of the up-soaring spirit, though the eye
Cannot perceive the lingering track of light
Stretching beyond the portals of the sky!

Hath it not joined the band
Blessed by the Savior in those ancient days?
Doth he not lead them in that stranger land,
And teach their infant voices songs of praise?

Call not the seraph back
With the vain yearnings of absorbing love!
Invisible yet known, its shining track
Is guide unerring to the courts above! IONE.
Boston, Mass.

THE GROUND OF HOPE AND THE COMING OF CHRIST.

GREAT days are coming. Scoffers and careless persons are too prone to say with those mentioned by Peter—'Where is the promise of his coming? All things remain as they were!'

Others do speak of his coming—but not of the true coming—'Peace on earth and good will to men!' Truly the coming of His kingdom can be no other than this—for the kingdom of Christ is not woe and calamity, and it is absurd to say that Christ has come in his kingdom when the reign of Peace and Good Will has not commenced. Glad tidings to all men is the coming of Christ—not glad tidings to a few and horror to every body else. When the prophets, in the Light of Truth, foretold a day of universal Peace and joy upon earth, they echoed that which the Spirit teacheth to every man: for is it not deeply written on all our hearts, that truth must conquer error, and that good must conquer evil? Has not hope—the prophet of nature—always pointed to the distant East where we see the clouds gilded with the uprising of Everlasting Love, from whence he cometh who shall save us from our sins?

The Prince of Salvation is not the Prince of a battle lost. The triumph of Jesus Christ is not the triumph of Napoleon returning from Russia with his handful of veterans, to fill the air with wailings as they recount the fate of the day and tell of the heaps of slain who lie bleaching in the snows of the North.

What is the triumph of Truth? What is the triumph of Peace? What is the triumph of Endless Love? Is it the earth in flames, and is the trump of Love's victory, the screams of perishing and despairing mortals? Such might be the triumph of a party—such might be the triumph of a sect. But the Maker of the Universe is not the organ of a sect or a party. He cannot triumph until all his sheep are brought into the fold—that all men are his sheep is evident from the fact that Jesus came to save those who were lost. How were they lost? Were they in a state of endless misery? Every soul is lost that is not of the true fold, but he that has true religion has Eternal Life. This has no reference to the past or future. Now is the judgment of this world. In Adam—in that life which is of the flesh—we shall experience death, because we learn good and evil, according to the rudiments of this world—the cunning of expediency; but down deep in the mind is that bright beacon which waves upward—a path of Light from earth to heaven. This is the second coming of Christ—It is the Star within, the hope of glory—the proof of immortality—the true God which is seen by the pure in heart. This is the kingdom of God within us, where Christ appeareth without sin unto salvation. As the lightning shineth out of one part of heaven even unto the other, making all things manifest, so is the coming of Christ within a Light superseding the doctrines of men and books, as it is better to drink at the Fountain of Living Water for ourselves, than to receive it at second hand, from the cisterns of others. This is that bread which cometh down from heaven—this is that Living Water, even God's own substance, which we must receive into our being, or we have no life in us. This is that ambrosia of the gods spoken of by the poets—the idea having been corrupted from the early times when the sons of God walked among men and were men—this is that manna which spoils when eaten from vessels, but which must be eaten fresh every day—this is that Gospel which comes not from man nor by man, but from the Fountain of Immortal Wisdom—this is Immanuel, God with us. This is that Truth which it is impossible for man to utter to his fellow, and which it was impossible for Jesus himself to bestow upon his disciples; for no man can know Jesus unless he first know the Father.

This is that New Jerusalem wherein there is no outward temple—no written rules or creeds—but the Lord God is the Light thereof; for the letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life. This is that Truth which is a devouring fire to consume all the stubble of human invention, to burn up all the written laws, and which none can abide unscathed but the pure in heart—those who buy nothing but plain, uncorrupted truth—no matter how sacred error may have become from tradition and expediency.

These rocks must be rent—these high places must be thrown down. The new wine must not be put into old bottles. At the appearing of the Light we must not run back into the house, to dress up the new revelation in those old clothes which have clad orthodoxy for eighteen centuries. All things must become new. The two women must no longer grind at the same mill—for he that is taught of the Light, must not seek also to be taught of the letter, lest the rent become worse, as in the case of the christian church, which sought to obey both God and Mammon! Where human wisdom lies dead, there are the wings of the great eagle to convey us away from the bondage of human traditions, books, and fears—to give us liberty from the bondage of sin and error, so that we need not that any man should teach us, for God is the teacher of his people. Our spirits become united to that Spirit and inherit the wisdom of God.

This coming of original Truth is of vastly more importance than would be the coming of Jesus' person in the skies; for how could that display affect our immortal nature? In what would it differ from a great display of fireworks? If this splendid pageant were brighter than any earthly display, we could not look upon it at all; for we cannot look upon the sun, with our fleshly eyes, without being blinded. We must, therefore, have new bodies, a new existence, before we could see this splendid appearance at all!

But Truth is a consuming fire! Those who are honest—those who take no bribes—those who stop their eyes from the seeing of evil, dwell in everlasting burnings; they abide in the devouring fire, and the smell of the flame is not upon their garments. But truth—the wisdom of God—purifies the mind from all stubble—preserves the good, and casts away the bad—and creates a new man, the earth being burned up, which is perdition to all ungodliness. Jesus distinctly told his disciples that the kingdom of heaven was within them. It is within us then that he is to reign, and every wicked thing in us will be consumed by the brightness of that coming which is called 'Christ within—the hope of glory,' and as the Son of Man was in heaven, so are all in heaven who live in God.

LOVE. What a lovely sight to the upright mind is the blending of young hearts on the aged sire, who has been their star of hope!

FADING AWAY.

LIKE a low wail, an undertone of sadness,
 One sound thrills through earth's sweetest harmonies,
 Casting a gloom o'er hearts elate with gladness,
 Like storm-clouds floating o'er fair summer seas.
 It cometh borne upon the breeze of morning,
 It speaketh in the melodies of day,
 It murmurs in the low-voiced song of even,
 Fading away!

At early spring-time, when the lovely flowers,
 Rise in their dream-like beauty from the sod,
 And, fanned by winds, and kissed by gentle showers,
 Are the immediate handiwork of God;
 We gaze with gloom, for on the coming morrow,
 Their loveliness we know will all decay,
 And on their leaves we read the song of sorrow,—
 Fading away!

When the glad summer comes, when earth rejoices,
 And the dim woods are eloquent with song,
 When ripe fruits glisten, and a thousand voices
 Float through the perfume-laden air along;
 Whene'er earth's joyous melody ascendeth,
 At dewy eve, dim night, or sunny day,
 A strain of sadness with its music blendeth,
 Fading away!

When autumn comes, a bright-hued mantle throwing
 O'er each fair scene; when many a forest tree,
 With crimson, gold and purple colors glowing,
 Arches o'er earth its leafy canopy;
 When bright-wing'd birds are through the clear sky winging,
 And the warm sun pours down its mellow ray,
 Through the soft air the mournful strain is ringing,
 Fading away!

When winter's tempest rages through the heaven,
 And bears on high the dead and rustling leaves;
 When by the frost the mountain rocks are riven,
 And dying nature o'er the sad scene grieves;
 When the cold ice king chains the rushing river,
 And turns to sparkling gems its dewy spray,
 Nature, as with expiring breath doth murmur,
 Fading away!

It casts a shadow o'er the bliss of meeting,
 And with affection a deep sadness blends,
 It mingles sorrow with our words of greeting,
 As tearfully we muse of absent friends;
 For to the heart there comes the mournful feeling,
 That this may be some loved one's dying day;
 Like muffled bells it through the heart is pealing,
 Fading away!

That dirge-like voice, its solemn accents murmur
 A truthful lesson to the listening heart,
 Saying, 'this earth is not thy home forever,
 And soon its fading glories will depart;
 Rise then, O spirit! rise on tireless pinion
 Above the fleeting vanities of clay,
 E'en now are all things of this brief dominion
 Fading away!

I love its voice,—that sound of solemn warning,
 Cheers my lone pathway o'er earth's midnight sod,
 With promise of a brighter, fairer dawning,
 New life within the paradise of God;
 It gives new energy to each endeavor,
 The glorious hope of an unending day;
 An angel speaketh in that thrilling murmur
 Fading away!

THE BELLE REFORMED.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

'WELL Miss P——! did you notice how Helen Manly acted the other evening at Miss Cummings' party?'

'Notice how she acted! yes: who could help noticing her? I declare, I never before in all my life, felt so mortified for any one, as I did for her!'

'Nor ever did I. There she was tittering and laughing with the beaux all the evening; in fact, she had but little to say to the ladies, save to repeat to them some of the fine things and silly flattery which the gentlemen had whispered in her ear.'

'Well they think but little of her, I know, and as for me, I am more and more disgusted with her, at our every meeting.'

'But she is a good girl after all; and when she is in the company of ladies only, none can be more agreeable or entertaining than she.'

'Except that then, she is always telling of pencilled passages in newspapers and periodicals which have been sent her, or showing love verses presented by "some one—she shant tell who."'

'Hey-dey! girls—who now is being dissected with the point of your tongues?' asked a noble looking youth, who had entered the room unobserved by the speaker. 'I would that all ladies were politicians, for then instead of slandering each other, they would be engaged in the more commendable enterprise of using their utmost exertions to prefix "Ex" to the present public officers, and raising their husbands and lovers to the vacated stations! But to be serious, of whom were you speaking?'

'Of one,' replied Miss P——, 'whom you would call "beautiful," whose mind, with the proper cultivation, could be rendered a casket of the most beautiful and polished gems, and who in short would not have an equal in the whole circle of my acquaintance, but who now by her foolish coquetry and flirting renders herself ridiculous and even despicable.'

'I know who it is,' rejoined the young man, and the color mantled his cheek; 'and your description, though glowing, is but too true. Only last evening, there was a little party which happened in at my boarding place to spend the evening, but learning that Helen was one of the number, I preferred entertainment from a book in my own room, but would you believe it? she inquired of one of the family where I was, and stealing out from the company, she flurried into my room, and without any seeming hesitancy, took a chair not far from me, and staid nearly an hour. I know that young men are flattered with the smiles and preference of a pretty girl, but I for one, am disgusted when she steps in the least beyond the boundary which strict propriety has prescribed, even if it be to make me sensible of what she confers. Yes,' continued he, 'I am actually sick of Helen Manly.'

'There was a time, James, when I never should have thought of hearing you speak of her in this way.'

'I know it, I know it,' replied he; 'there was a time when——' but his voice trembled, a tear started to his eye, and he left the room.

'But why do you not speak to Helen of the impropriety of such conduct?' inquired a younger married lady who had until now remained silent; 'you know she has neither brother or sister to point out faults, and perhaps if you were to portray hers, in a candid and friendly manner, she would correct them.'

'Mercy me!' almost screamed Miss L——, the young lady who introduced the conversation, 'I would not for my life—she would never forgive me.'

'But could you not more easily forgive yourself than it is possible for you to do, when you in her presence profess a warm friendship, and in her absence belie that profession by such unsparing condemnation.'

'But if I did tell her, it would do no good, she always thinks she knows more than any one else.'

'I have often thought of speaking to her about it, Mrs. Mory,' said Miss P——, 'and as often determined that I would, but when an opportunity offers for me to do so, my heart fails me.'

'Well,' replied Mrs. Mory, 'I believe there is not a girl of a better mind or of a more benevolent or affectionate disposition than Helen, and it is a pity that she should be ruined, as she certainly will be if she continues such a course of conduct, when proper treatment might effect a reformation. Now when I have an opportunity, I shall tell her what a reputation she is acquiring, if she have not already acquired, for herself, and urge her to a change of conduct.'

'In pity's name don't tell her what I have said,' chimed both the girls in one voice, 'she will be so offended.'

'Girls!' said Mrs. Mory, sternly, 'do you not know that by saying things of Helen which you are not willing should reach her ears, you deserve nearly as much censure as she? But you need not fear. I too should feel condemned did I stoop to the meanness of a tattler. But this need not be—I can tell her the opinion of community without naming one individual of it, and if her conduct is as you have represented, she certainly can but see its ridiculousness if pointed out to her.'

We need not repeat what our readers have already learned of Helen, by the above conversation, but it may be necessary to say something more of her, and of others also, who were there introduced, in order that the sequel may be the more readily understood. She was the only child of a fond and widowed mother, who thought it enough that her daughter should be called kind dispositioned and the most beautiful of the young ladies by whom she was surrounded, and with whom she associated. This was awarded, for none could deny but that she was both; and at an early age she was ushered into society, not in the least noted for depression of spirits or want of hilarity, without any one interested to discipline her conduct to guard her against the errors into which the young are often led by a volatile temperament, and therefore in a short time she was noted for unrestrained mirthfulness. But this was not all; she knew she was beautiful, and she always had a ready response for those who addressed her; possessing an ardent love of praise and admiration, she sought the applause awarded to wit and beauty by those who were the most willing to bestow it. And while many frailties and imperfections are allotted to woman as peculiar to her sex, we believe that observation will vindicate the assertion, that a disposition to flatter, which originates many and grievous evils, is a characteristic of the 'sterner sex.' We do not deny that there may be exceptions honorable to man, yet we believe that as a general thing the position will hold correct, and while we lament the weakness of our own sex in listening to, and being led astray by it, we condemn, nay more, despise the more than weakness, of those who claim superiority in wisdom and judgment, and yet deal in this folly.

It was flattery that enticed Helen beyond the limits of womanly propriety, and by its intoxicating influence rendered her so much more deserving of censure and ridicule, in the society of its bestowers than in that of others; it is flattery alas! that blinds many—too many young females to the proper course by which they might gain that which they so sincerely desire—real admiration and esteem. For however much young men may appear pleased with an acknowledged belle, few, very few, would choose her for a wife, or desire a sister to imitate her gaiety, or earn her appellation. Yet there was one upon whose heart the beauty and sprightliness of Helen made a more serious impression, and that was James S——. He looked upon her as a bright creature sent to earth, to cheer and gladden and discipline the hearts of those by whom she was surrounded; and while he looked upon her in silent admiration, he as silently wished that she might be his own. But though he never mingled with the flatterers, or told her the thoughts of his heart, yet her quick eye was not slow in reading his glance, and she presumed on the affection which she had never been told was hers. Time passed, and he too plainly saw those traits of character, which rendered her the subject of condemnation and laughter, and he turned away disgusted with the conduct which was intended to please, and pained that gifts rich as hers should be laid at so unworthy a shrine as a coquette's. And he too condemned her while he vainly strove to efface the impression which she had at first made on his heart.

But of all who felt grieved by her conduct, or ridiculed and condemned her faults, not one spoke with affectionate frankness to her of them, or intimated any impropriety of deportment. Some there were who were fearful of giving offence; others who though they did not hesitate to censure her severely when she was not present, professed too great a regard for her feelings to tell her the common opinion; and others still, who envied her the attention which she received, and therefore were not anxious to correct the faults which submitted her to so much censure. Mrs. Mory was different from either class. Yet she was not one of that number who boast so much of their 'plain heartedness,' while in fact they never openly censure any, except those toward whom they bear no little pique, and do even this with an intention, not so much to effect a reformation, as to wound the heart and mortify the feelings. I would there were more such as she in our world. Benevolent, noble minded and ingenuous, she never spoke of the character of any, in their absence, in a manner in which she would not be willing to speak in their presence, and never hesitated to reprove promptly yet gently, whatever fault fell beneath her eye. And when she expressed a determination to speak to Helen, the young ladies who heard it, felt almost sure her reproof would be given in such a manner that it would be heeded.

Some days passed before Mrs. Mory saw a proper time to put her resolution into effect, but an invitation to spend the day with her, which Helen accepted, offered the wished for opportunity. Cautiously she introduced the conversation, and then in a frank and plain manner, showed her the situation in which she stood. She told her the frequently expressed opinion entertained of her, and then pointed to instances in her conduct which would naturally give rise to such opinions. Nor did she fail to point out the impropriety of her leaving the company of a party visiting a female friend, to intrude into the private room of a young man, who had manifestly avoided her. And then she showed her the exalted station she might occupy in the society in which she moved, if she would but change such a course, and by cultivating her mind, strive to render herself useful.

Helen did not listen to her friend unmoved. She wept bitterly, and taking Mrs. Mory's hand in hers, 'O tell me,' said she, 'how I may retrieve what I have lost, and escape the vortex into which I am so fast hurrying?'

Mrs. Mory mingled her tears with Helen's, as she replied, 'Gladly indeed would I place you on that elevation which can never be attained without much firmness and prudence of purpose and action. Of late you have mingled in society by far too much—in future it may be necessary that you, for a time, seek the opposite extreme. Leave home but seldom, and when you do, guard well your deportment. You may again be sometimes tempted to smile on the flattery, and even to seek the caresses of young men, but inasmuch as you value your peace and reputation, beware that you do not heed the delusive syren! Listen with manifest coldness and indifference to the tale of flattery, and heed the voice of delicacy as well as good sense, which forbid your repeating it on any occasion, even to those in whom you place the utmost confidence.'

Much more passed between them which might not interest the reader if repeated, but when Helen took leave of her friend at the garden gate, she said in a voice full of decision, while it trembled with emotion, 'I know that I can and I will reform!' Mrs. Mory was nearly as much affected as she, and replying—'God aid you in the noble resolution!' she bade her good evening and turned to the house.

Time on ever varying wing passed on, bearing changes to all, but to none a more healthful and pleasing one, than to Helen. She had acted in concert with her resolution, and was reformed. True, the struggle had been a hard one, and at times the temptation seemed almost overpowering. Young friends called, and with blandished voice and winning smile, solicited her company in some newly planned ride or visit; and young men had repeated the story of her wit and beauty, and sued for her smiles, but she remembered the admonitions of Mrs. Mory, and calling to mind the great object she had in view, she was enabled to give a polite but decided refusal to the former, and to listen unmoved to the latter. But it cannot be supposed that with a mind constituted as was Helen's, she saw without one pang of regret, the gradual falling off of her former associates, and the homage which was once dedicated to her, laid at the feet of another. No: but still she felt a new and sweet satisfaction, as degree by degree she succeeded in overpowering her inordinate love of admiration, and was conscious she was securing the esteem of the intelligent and good. Her leisure hours, of which she had now a greater number, were not employed as before, in reading novels or plays from which to learn some new air or feat, that by practising she might gain more hollow attention, but in perusing books that were calculated to elevate her feelings and enlighten her intellect; and she wondered how it could be that so valuable a fund of enjoyment had so long remained within her reach without attracting her love. A few fleeting months rolled by, and again she mingled more freely in society—not as the gay, forward, and ridiculous coquette, but as the retiring, beloved, and truly admired Helen Manly.

She was still the cheerful friend and companion, and contributed more by far, to the enjoyment of those by whom she was surrounded, than she ever had in her gayest hours. All noticed the change, many wondered what had wrought it, but none were at heart more pleased than James S—. He had remembered her as one endowed with gifts such as nature is not frequently lavish in bestowing; and now that the faults which had once tarnished and nearly obscured the brightness of those gifts had been removed, he did not hesitate to acknowledge the sway she held over his heart. And she, now that she had learned to justly prize the value of real worth, and sincere affection, accepted with emotions of gratitude, the hand and heart which he proffered. And how was it with Mrs. Mory? She saw the reformation she had been instrumental in effecting, and rejoiced. She had obeyed the dictates of duty and the noble principles of her nature, and the consciousness of so doing, together with what followed her works, she felt to be a commensurate reward, a great recompense. I would that all would earn such a recompense as hers, by emulating her virtues; and instead of giving wide circulation to reports derogatory to the character of those for whom they profess friendship, endeavor, by the kind voice of admonition and entreaty, to warn them of their errors and win them from them. If such a course were pursued, how many that are now almost given over to folly and dissipation, would be turned to the service of virtue and usefulness! How many, like Helen Manly, when made sensible of their faults, would with grateful hearts acknowledge their advisers worthy the name of friends, and more endowed with the heavenly spirit of love and good will, than those who look smilingly on, and never intimate any imperfections.

OUR STAR.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

WHEN eve in all its soft repose
Falls lightly o'er the earth,
And human life no longer flows
In streams of noisy mirth,
When nodding flowers fold up the wings
That fanned the drowsy bee,
One radiant star shines forth, and brings
Sweet memories of thee.

Our star! How oft when misty shades
Have curtained o'er the vales,
And birds that fill the woody glades
Have ceased their witching tales,
How oft that one bright constant star
Will waken Memory's tide,
And bid me wish, when distant far,
To call thee to my side.

Hours spent with thee beneath its light
Have been serenely blest;
The spell that bound me with its might—
Why need it be confessed?
The beating of a kindred heart—
Sweet sympathy of mind—
How can I, when we are apart,
That mystic spell unbind?

OUR STAR! Oh! let its golden beams,
Where'er thy path may be,
Awake, amid thy changeeful dreams,
Some gentle thoughts of me.
And whensoever, in silent prayer,
I meet its hallowed ray,
For thee, twin object of its care,
My heart shall kneel and pray

DISCOURSES FOR COMMUNION SEASON, UPON TRAITS IN THE CHARACTER OF CHRIST.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

DISCOURSE I.—THE TENDERNESS OF JESUS.

'Jesus wept.' JOHN xi. 35.

I PROPOSE to engage the attention of the readers of the Repository, from time to time, in a series of discourses upon Traits in the Character of Christ. In this way, perhaps, we may bring our Great Exemplar more vividly before us, during the season that precedes, or follows the Communion Service. Of a certainty I do not expect to do adequate justice to my themes. Indeed it will not be my aim to present elaborate essays upon these subjects, or profound thoughts, but merely to bring before you, my readers, sketches, suggestive hints, a lineament here and there of that meek Face, and bloody Brow, that may have some influence upon your hearts—that may tend, in some measure, to secure to professors of religion more fully the objects of the Communion Service, by exciting in their bosoms admiration and love for him who said—'Do this in remembrance of me;' and that may kindle in other souls a desire to become of the band of open and avowed followers of that lowly but great Teacher, and a determination to gather with us around the table not merely of his dying, but of his living love. I devoutly pray God, that this end may be reached, and that I may be guided in my work.

My friends, Christ is to be studied. The peculiarity of the Savior consisted not so much in the originality of his teachings, as in his LIFE. We are endeavoring to make good states, and to build up excellent institutions; but 'Christ,' as I once heard it sublimely remarked, 'is an institution himself.' In that one life, so humble that it was despised by Roman soldiers—so beautiful that it embodies the best maxims of ancient sages; so meek that it attracted the homage of but a few peasants—so sublime that it shines far above the procession of all earth's kings;—in that one life, deep and pure, lie the elements of all the good that we seek to achieve by organization, to build up in society, to develop in individual character, to cultivate by discipline, or to secure by prayer.

I say, then, that life is to be studied. Studied with a more intense interest than we bestow upon books—these are but the emanations of human wisdom, at best they are but borrowed fragments of the Divine; studied even with a closer attention than we extend to nature, for, as another has said, 'Nature gives us only the scale, but Christ the spirit of the Deity.' And here let me remark further, we must study Christ in simplicity of comprehension, as a real being. I mean by this, that we should throw no mystical drape, no metaphysical distinctions, around that life—but should view Jesus as a being of body and soul, who felt as all men, without sin, would feel—who actually taught, and smiled, and wept, and sympathized—who had friendships and desires.

The doctrine of two natures in Christ, has to me objections apart from those which apply to its immediate connection with the doctrine of the Trinity. I am perplexed and kept at a distance by these two natures. One, it is true, is the nature of man—but the other is the nature of God. When Jesus weeps, I feel as if it were a kindred sentiment to the best feelings that spring up in the human heart; but, as I think so, the thought flashes upon me, that he who thus wept was the very Deity, and the idea of a kindred sentiment is absorbed in the awfulness of Godhead. When Jesus prays, we hear his voice like the voice of a fellow creature partaking in our infirmities without our sin, struggling against our fears and doubts; but then I reflect that this is but his human nature that prays—that in him also is enshrined the Almighty Spirit that made heaven and earth; and that prayer is like no human prayer—it is guarded by a mystery, which I cannot understand—it is a communion with the Eternal, which, from the very nature of the case, I can never feel. When Jesus crowns his perfections upon the cross, and triumphs over the strength of suffering and the force of death, I feel as if my poor, frail nature, at some coming period, may arrive at such perfection—as if I too might triumph thus over all sin and all fear, and rise to intimate communion, to holy oneness with Christ and with God;—but the thought that that was the Omnipotent, whose temporary human nature only, suffered in that dying hour—that the man that would have sunk was upheld by the God who hath all power, and that these were thus manifested in one person; this thought quenches the glow of lofty hope, and makes the aspiration almost presumptuous.

It is thus that I am perplexed by the mysterious doctrine of two natures in Jesus—making Christ very God and very man. But I do not deem that the Scriptures have so represented Jesus. I will not deny his super-angelic nature, nor am I prepared to affirm it. Let me say what appears to me the most simple and consoling doctrine. It is that Christ was a man, as we are men—possessed of human nature, liable to human feeling. With all this, he sinned not. He went through earth, lowly, and despised by many. He wept, he prayed, he toiled, he loved. His aim was the good of our race. His motive was God's glory, and universal benevolence. I look upon that being as one whom I may call my brother, notwithstanding my infirmities and my sins. But oh! what a glorious hope is connected with this relation. If Christ was a human being, then I see in him what human nature is capable of becoming. In his resistance to temptation, I see that I too may prevail against it. In his meekness my pride may be overcome. In his love my affections may be enlarged. In his patient endurance of suffering, my resignation and trust may be developed. In his forgiveness of injuries my mercy may take root. In his triumph over death, I may learn to conquer the conqueror—and in his resurrection, glorious in immortality and perfected in righteousness, I discover the lustre that my sinful, fallible, tempted and struggling soul may one day wear. I say, this aspect of Christ's nature—as a man, showing what man may become—is to me encouraging—is to me a means of bringing Jesus very near to us. I can, then, in some degree, feel his sentiments by my own—I can sympathize with him—I can be drawn to him in the bonds of an intimate brotherhood.

But, not to discuss this point further, let me say, that it is peculiarly to what all would term the human phase of Christ's character, that I would lead your thoughts in these discourses. In so far as Christ is our Exemplar, he is so only to the extent of the human faculties—he is so only as he manifested human powers and feelings—allowing, of course, for that communion and connection of man with God, that takes place with every righteous soul, that indeed makes Christ one with God, but makes his true disciples one with him and the Father also. In these discourses, then, we will consider Christ as a being of human feelings and capacities. We will do this for a special object, and that object I have already mentioned—in order to bring his character more vividly before us—in order that we may realize him more.

There are two classes of errors respecting Christ. One lies with those who treat the Master with too much familiarity—who even think they espy weaknesses in him. We need not say that this is a wrong view of Jesus. Whatever may be his nature, he is still the holiest being that ever walked our earth. Whatever may be his nature, we do not intend by any thing that we have said to be understood that he had nothing in him more than ordinary manhood. To him was given the Spirit without measure, and a power and a sanctity such as make him distinct from all others. Still is he the Master, still is he the great Teacher. He who held direct communion with God—at whose presence sin shrunk abashed—at whose voice the dead stirred in their graves—who spoke with such authority that the learned were rebuked, and the ignorant felt his power—who dispensed judgment on the very cross, and conquered death in the very grave—to whom the heavens spoke, and angels ministered; he is no being to be treated with the cold formality of criticism—no being to have his seamless, stainless robe, rent by rude and profane hands.

But, on the other hand—and is it not a common error?—Christ must not be too much separated from us. He must not be made an abstraction—a passionless, unkindred being. This is the result of a false theology. Men who vociferate the name of Jesus the loudest—who use it the most frequently in their exhortations and their prayers—may, after all, know least of the true spirit and real character of the Master. To them, he is some mysterious being, of whom they have only a vague conception—an awful and shadowy idea. He is not really a brother—a fellow-being—speaking to us as one who loves and sympathizes with us. They speak of the love they bear to Christ—but is it not, often, a strained and spasmodic feeling? Is it a love any thing like that which they feel for their friends, their benefactors of every-day life—a natural love—a love gushing from the heart, that cannot help coming, any more than water from the bosom of the ice-cliff, when the genial sunshine smites it? Is this the feeling which we have for the great Teacher? Is it a calm, yet a deep feeling—a feeling based upon intellectual admiration, as well as upon impulse—a feeling resulting from a due consideration of the beautiful, and sublime, and holy features of the Savior's character? It is, chiefly, to cultivate something of this true feeling in regard to Christ, that I now present these discourses. I would guard against an over-familiarity, an estimation too low, on the one hand; but I would be instrumental in bringing to a vivid conception, to a rational admiration of the true character of the Master, on the other. Let us, then, with this view, proceed, in the remainder of this discourse, to consider, as one trait in his character, the TENDERNESS of Jesus.

'Jesus Wept.' The fact thus briefly recorded, lets us, at once, into the sympathetic element of Christ's character. Having this truth before us, we cannot consider Christ as the mere Teacher, or the mere Reformer, or the mere Prophet. He is all these—but he is something more. He is all these, but all these he might have been, without sympathising so deeply with humanity. Understand me. I do not say that Jesus could have been to us and to the world what he is now, if he had not possessed as much tenderness as he did. But I say, he would have been Teacher, Reformer, and Prophet, without possessing so much. He lived in a stern age—an age with whose notions the austerity of John the Baptist, and the strictness of the Pharisees, corresponded more than the social freedom and the undistinguishing communion of the Nazarene peasant. Had he come, then, with the asperity of the bigot, or the fire of the zealot, he might have been a great Teacher. Truths he might have taught that would have made their souls tremble and shrink within them—that would have fallen upon their hearts like the hammer upon the rock. And as a Reformer, he might have taken the mailed corselet and the unsheathed brand. He might have kindled watch-fires upon every fortress in Judea, and have called to his standard unfurled to the free winds of Galilee, spirits as ardent and as brave as those which, in days gone by, gathered around the patriotic Maccabees. And as a Reformer, he might have swept, at least, for a time, the abomination of Roman tyranny from the land—he might have quelled the pride and exposed the hypocrisy of the priesthood; and upon the broken sword and the fallen mitre, he might have reared the throne of a national sovereignty, a patriotic administration of new and better laws. Even as a Prophet, he might have come on a stern embassy, and perhaps the absorbing intensity of his mission, might have had no time to suffer the gentle tear at the sight of misery, but engaged in his purpose, might have passed on with untiring feet and uplifted eye, pointing with quivering finger to the cloud of blood and the meteor-sword that hung on the skirts of the fast-coming future. It was not because he was a Teacher, a Reformer, and a Prophet, then, that Christ possessed this deep tenderness. It shows a more intimate relationship between him and us. It reveals him to us as a man—a loving, gentle, self-sacrificing man; and thus we are drawn unto him—thus he becomes very near to us.

There is one point now to which I would direct your attention as an illustration of the kindness of Christ. Twice is it recorded that Jesus wept. But in neither instance did he shed tears for himself—not his own sorrows came flitting before him—not the dark calamities of his own latter days stirred bitter fountains in his soul. But his grief was for others. One of these instances was the weeping of Jesus over Jerusalem. The connection of the event, the crisis that so soon followed, the circumstance itself, all constitute a scene of the most sublime beauty—of the most touching interest. You will recollect that, as Luke records it, it followed immediately upon an occasion of enthusiastic triumph—the only extensive outburst of popular praise—the only formal jubilee—that is recorded to have accompanied the steps of the Savior. As he came down the Mount of Olives, as he went on his way towards Jerusalem, the excited people plucked palm branches and strewed them before him, and cast their garments in his path, and uttered hosannas. It was in the very flush of this triumph that the Evangelist has penned that touching passage—'And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it.' Proud, beautiful Jerusalem! with all its holy memories, with all its consecrated places, with its glory of palaces, its splendor of loveliness—it burst upon his vision! And at what a time! That brief flush of excitement could not deceive him. He knew that he went to his death. He knew that if now there were some who scattered their robes in his path, there would soon be those who would rejoice to see him clothed in scarlet mockery—if there were hands that waved palm branches before him, there were also hands that would readily plait a crown of thorns. And some may say, that it was for this, perhaps, that he wept—that he wept for the blindness and hardness of that people whom he came to save. Through those very streets that now opened to receive his triumphal procession, would soon rush the living tide, breaking with hoarse murmurs into the cry—'Crucify him!' Through these very streets soon must he bear the heavy wood on which he was to be nailed. There Judas should betray him. There Peter—eager, exultant Peter, who now, perchance, hung upon his path in all the glow of Jewish hope that his Master's earthly kingdom was about to dawn—there ardent, frail, well-meaning Peter, should deny him. There friends should forsake, and foes should rage. And there, upon those very gates that now gleam bright before his triumphant progress, as it were lifting up their heads to admit the King of Zion—upon those very gates, in a few days, he should turn his dying eyes, his pale, blood-streaming face. And, perhaps, some will say, for this he wept. Oh! it was a sublime, a pictured sight—Christ weeping over Jerusalem. That isolated brightness of his life behind, that cloud of darkness gathering before. The Sent of God, the Rejected of men, weeping over one of earth's cities, the very city that should refuse and crucify him. But he did not weep for himself—how it adds to the sublimity of the event!—he did not weep for himself. He wept for Jerusalem. He wept, perhaps, as a patriot, with a patriot's noblest sentiment. That city of a nation's pride, how soon should it be trampled under foot! How soon should the heel of the foeman go over her martyr-graves, and the desolating ploughshare strike her last remnant from the earth! He wept as a righteous man. Her temple with its lofty pinnacle must fall beneath the engulfing flames—the trumpet of Titus should ring through its hallowed arches—the banner of the Pagan, dripping with the awful baptism of blood, should be reared upon its very altar. He wept as a Prophet. He saw, with fearful minuteness, the sights others could not see—the woes such as had not been from the beginning of the world, nor never again should be. He saw the fierce fight of factions, the dreadful wars of brethren. He saw the famine-stricken mothers devouring their children. He saw the awful work of retribution in which 'there was not room enough for the crosses, nor crosses enough for the bodies.'

Blood and flame, desolation and ruin, he saw it all—and he wept—wept for others—wept as a tender, loving man.

The other instance of Christ's weeping, is connected with our text. It was at the grave of Lazarus. Christ was no anchorite—no unsocial idealist. He had friendships. How deep, how true they must have been! That humble house at Bethany, how often did it witness the beauty and the sanctity of this friendship! Does it not bring the life of Christ more freshly, more humanly, so to speak, before us, when we contemplate him as leaving the scenes of his public labor in the great city—leaving the excited and curious crowd—the bigoted Pharisee, the sceptical Sadducee, the painful suspicions, the open insults, the coarse attacks of men—and retiring to the home of Lazarus, and Martha, and Mary? Jesus loved to hear the voice of friendship. Meek traveller over life's thorniest track, he loved to grasp a kindly hand, and hear a soothing word.

But one of those dear friends died. Four days had he lain in the tomb when Jesus reached it. It was here, that with inimitable truthfulness the Evangelist tells us that he wept. And on whose account was this? It was not for himself, unless so far as the grave might suggest his own death. But it was not the grave that was bitter in his lot. He stood there over the sepulchre of another, armed with the power to summon him forth in his grave-clothes—what would he do when he went with the same resistless power, prepared to achieve a loftier victory, into his own? It could not have been grief for the loss of Lazarus that caused him to weep. He had expressly declared that he slept—and to him it was so. He had power to call him from that sleep. Never, moreover, had he asserted in a more sublime manner the dignity of his mission—the great power that was given him. It was in reply to a remark by Martha, that Jesus uttered those triumphant words that have rung over so many tombs on the land and in the sea—'I am the Resurrection and the Life!' And in the whole course of his ministry, perhaps he did not perform a miracle that redounded more to the glory of God, or that aided more to convince the people of his divine authority. And this he must have foreseen.

We cannot find, then, that he wept for his own case, or on account of his own peculiar griefs. But we have a clue to his weeping in the fact that others wept—Mary wept, and the Jews wept with her; and it troubled Jesus. Did he not weep, then, with sympathy? Did not the tenderness of his nature vibrate to their sorrow? At least we know, that it was from no selfish cause he wept.

Thus, these two instances may serve to show us how near in human emotions was Christ to us. When I look upon him as the miracle-sent and miracle-guided, I must behold him with reverence. When I go with him to Calvary, and hear his dying prayer, his mighty yielding up of the Ghost, I am constrained to say with the Roman soldier, 'Truly this was the Son of God!' And when I tread with him the rocky pavement of the sepulchre, and feel the thrill of his awful rising, and hear the rush of angels wings go by me, and he stands upon his grave-clothes—not all the light that breaks through the unsealed tomb, can dissipate my awe. But when I pause with him before Jerusalem, and see his full, fast tears—when I get near the grave of Lazarus, and hear him weep—I feel that he too is somewhat like me. I feel that he was a tender, loving being, sympathising with humanity, and I know it is a brother I am called to love.

Let these two instances suffice to illustrate this trait in the character of Christ. As we draw nigh the Communion Table, let us remember the tenderness of Jesus. Let us remember also that he was a manifestation of God, to whom, although human weaknesses are impossible, belong mercy and compassion. In that mercy, in that compassion, let us put our trust. We can never get beyond it. Wherever we may be, still will they spread above and around us. What if that doctrine which is stirring so many minds with fear, and driving so many wild with madness, what if it should prove true, and the world be shattered upon its golden axle? we cannot get beyond the mercy and the compassion of God. Should this crystal habitation dissolve, God's nature will remain the same.

Again: When we sin, let us remember what it is against which we sin. We sin not merely against a law, not merely against a Judge—we sin against infinite mercy and compassion. Let us remember this, and let us sin no more.

'HOMEWARD BOUND.'

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

WELCOME, bright and early morning,
Thou art welcome to my heart,
Though from dear familiar faces,
With the dawn I must depart.

Farewell friends! the word is spoken;
For the parting hour has come,
And I go, with glad impatience,
To my long forsaken home.

Think not, though a smile is stealing
O'er the cheek with tear drops wet,
That I turn away with coldness,
Or without one fond regret.

Were this heart of mine laid open
Where its cherished feelings dwell,
With the sweet and sad emotions,
All too deep for words to tell;

Ye might see how much lies hidden
'Neath a calm untroubled brow;

Now a bounding thrill of pleasure,
And a soul all saddened now.

Grief and joy so oft are mingled,
In the cup we drain below,
That we taste till sweet from bitter,
Joy from grief we hardly know.

Fair the scenes my steps are leaving;
Scenes through which I loved to roam;
Long will memory retain them;
But there is 'no place like home.'

Now we reach the glancing waters;
Now we leave the busy shore;
Hasten barque and bear me onward!
Bear me to my home once more!

Swift we sail the blue waves over;
For the wind is fresh and fair;
But my thoughts outspeed the vessel,
Home!—they are already there.

There I see the dear loved dwelling,
Where youth's golden hours have flown,
And the smiling pleasant places,
All from sunny childhood known.

'Homeward bound!' O, words of gladness!
Thrilling my impatient heart:
Give me wings! the wind is dying;
See how slow the waters part!

Once I loved to watch the sunbeams
Dancing on the foaming tide,
And the shores and hills receding
Till they crowned the landscape wide.

Now I have no eye for beauty;
Wave and shore no charm can show;
I can only count the moments,
Count and chide them as they go.

Chide them that they move so slowly,
When I fain would have them fly;
Chide them that they idly linger,
With the wished for haven nigh.

Hush my heart, nor beat so wildly!
Thou canst patient wait I ween;
For our barque is hastening homeward,
Though long miles still lie between.

Friends I leave, may Heaven's sweet blessings,
Ever round your pathway come;
May the friends I seek be blessed,
And thrice blest the 'light of home.'

'LIFE. Many have learned secrets under the roof of a poor man, which would add to the luxury of the rich. The blessings of a cheerful fancy and a quick eye come from nature, and the trailing of a vine may develop them as well as the curtaining of a king's chamber.'

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF WOMAN'S LIFE. NO. VII.

BY CHARLOTTE.

THE AULD WIFE.

'John Anderson, my Jo, John,
We've clomb life's hill thegither,
And mony a canty day, John,
We've had with ane anither;
Now we maun totter down, John,
But hand in hand we'll go,
And sleep thegither at the foot,
John Anderson, my Jo.'

How OFTEN has that beautiful and touching old ballad of Burns' risen from my heart to my lips, as I have witnessed the devotion of old Hannah Evans to her still more aged and infirm husband; the quickness with which she discerned his slightest wants, the alacrity with which she ministered to them, her gentleness and the numberless little kindnesses she seems to delight in bestowing. To me, her unwearied love and devotion seem to diffuse a bright 'light' amid the numerous shadows that darken woman's life, and so I am tempted to pen a sketch, which imperfect though it be, may perhaps convey to you some idea of one, who is deserving of far higher praise than this simple tribute to her excellence.

Hannah Lee was the youngest child and the only daughter of parents, who were born, bred, and married, and who hoped to live and die in the same quiet village. They dwelt in a venerable cottage, weather-stained and moss-roofed, near the church, for in addition to his peculiar calling, (he was a carpenter) old James Lee had succeeded his father as village sexton. Beneath that lowly roof he had received life, it had been the scene of his boyish pleasures, and thither in the first prime of manhood, he had borne from a similar dwelling his bride, a fair, meek village maiden with no dowry save virtue and affection. There for many years had they dwelt together, poor and humble it is true, but blessed with tranquillity and happiness such as gladdens few wealthy habitations. They were healthy and industrious, their children were good and well behaved, and they felt that they had no cause to murmur.

Their sons grew up tall, sturdy youths, and possessing the genuine spirit of Yankee enterprise, they left their quiet village to 'seek their fortunes' amid more stirring scenes. Hannah remained at home, a fine, healthy, well grown lass, who among the rustic youths of Heathside bore the enviable reputation of a beauty—a title which would doubtless have shocked the refined ideas of modern, lisping city beaux, and fragile, pale-faced, wasp-waisted belles, could they have seen Hannah Lee's plump, ruddy cheeks, with which the sun and the rain had taken unwarrantable liberties, her full, ripe lips (rather too full and too wide, to be likened to a cleft cherry,) and her well developed figure, which gave ample evidence that it had never suffered from compression or whalebones, or any other bones, save those which nature had given her, and which might possibly have weighed down one or two dapper young gentlemen of the present day, (this is only a rough guess) but Hannah had a pair of merry blue eyes, and an abundance of tastefully arranged hair, which a poet or a painter, or some such out-of-the-way genus might, perhaps, have raved about, and likened it to that of Allston's Beatrice, or to the tresses of Petrarch's Laura, or some equally renowned personage; but the unsophisticated farmer lads of Heathside, had probably never heard of these ladies, famed in Italian song, so they unceremoniously called it red hair, and only admired its graceful braids and large, natural curls; and some few were found who were so completely devoid of taste, as to say, 'Hannah Lee would be pretty if it were not for her hair!'—but there were few who did not love and admire her, and so if any one dared hazard such an envious remark, they were generally silenced by the reply, that 'she was pretty in spite of her hair.' And alas for modern nerves! how would they have been utterly annihilated by Hannah Lee's merry-ringing laugh! For in those days, it was not considered ill-bred to give vent to one's exuberance of mirthful feeling in a good hearty laugh; or if it were, the code of fashionable etiquette had not reached the primitive village of Heathside; but be that as it might, certain it is that Hannah's laugh was sweet music in the ears of those who loved her, and made the old walls of the cottage ring, and the hearts of her aged parents leap with joy and gladness. A happy creature was Hannah Lee, ay, and a good and kind one too!—with a leal and by no means narrow heart, for she found plenty of room in its numerous corners and crevices for a host of friends, and as she grew to woman's estate, she discovered that there was still abundant room for another occupant—and who was this to be? Among the village beaux to whom she was the centre of attraction at huskings, quiltings and singing-school, Hannah had early given the preference to John Evans, the village blacksmith—a tall, robust, good looking youth, just such a one I fancy, as Longfellow must have had in his mind, when he wrote that admirable description of the son of Vulcan. John was steady, industrious and well principled, and it was universally acknowledged that he and Hannah were every way worthy of each other. It was not the fashion then as now, for a couple after a few weeks' or it may be months' acquaintance, to go to the altar knowing as little of each others' characters and tempers as on the first day they met; and so John and Hannah plodded through a three year's courtship, which, humdrum as it may appear to us, seemed perfectly proper, and was undoubtedly very agreeable to them. 'The course of their true love' ran perfectly smooth, and there was every prospect of their being married without any obstacle interfering to impede their progress. Hannah's preparations were all made, a small cottage had been rented, only a few minutes walk from her maiden home, they had been regularly cried in church on three successive Sabbaths, and the next week was appointed for their wedding, when a shadow (alas! that such there be!) darkened their pathway. Suddenly and without warning, old James Lee was struck with palsy—and a second stroke rapidly succeeding the first, deprived the old man of the use of his limbs, and the village of its sexton, while his wife was afflicted with an inflammation in her eyes, which impaired her sight, and threatened eventually to destroy it altogether. Hannah's wedding was necessarily delayed, and when after a lapse of several weeks, she found that her father's helplessness continued, and her mother was totally blind, after tearful meditation and earnest prayer, she concluded to release John from his engagement. With as much calmness and composure as she could command, she made known her decision to her lover.

'And why Hannah, should this misfortune separate us now, any more than if it had happened after our marriage? I am well and strong and able to work—let your parents remove with us to our cottage, and I doubt not that with the help of God I shall be enabled to support you all.'

'Nay John, this must not be! That you could and would do all this, I do not doubt; and had this misfortune fallen on us after our union, I could only have resigned myself to the stroke and assisted you to bear the additional burthen; but I see the hand of God in this dispensation—I too am able and willing to work, and it will be alike my duty and my pleasure to live and toil for my aged and helpless parents. I alone must bear the burden he has laid upon me and fitted me to endure. Time will soon efface from your mind, dear John, all painful recollections, and you will find some one equally well calculated as I am to make you happy.'

John plead warmly, but Hannah had nerved herself to meet every argument, and finally they parted. John strove two or three times to renew his suit, but it was unavailing, and unable to live amid the scenes that continually recalled his disappointment, he at length gave up his occupation and departed for the West. Hannah was now left alone to toil for her aged parents, to cheer with her smiles the sadness of the helpless one, and to brighten with love and kindly words, the gloom of her who sat in perpetual darkness. She knew if her brothers were acquainted with their circumstances, they would be ready and willing to assist her; but she was also aware that they had now families of their own, and she would not call on them for aid. Hannah was an excellent seamstress, and found no difficulty in obtaining work—and her mother who as her sight grew dim, had applied herself diligently to knitting, was enabled to ply her needles as rapidly and skilfully as before her deprivation. This employment answered a double purpose, relieving the depression and melancholy which would naturally have resulted from continued idleness, and also affording pleasure by enabling her to add her mite towards the support of the family. While Hannah and her mother were thus engaged, the old man sat in his great easy-chair by the window, and with the Bible outspread on a little stand before him, read to his companions from the pages of holy writ. Thus all were employed, and they soon grew to be, if not happy, at least cheerful and content. And did Hannah experience no regretful feelings, as she sat there between her stricken parents—no yearning after the happiness which might have been her portion as the wife of John Evans? Did the memories of the past never rise up and haunt her, and fill her soul with their subduing and saddening influence? Of this we cannot say—no mention was made of his name by her parents, and only twice did Hannah manifest any emotion on hearing it from stranger-lips; once when an officious gossip of the village brought the tidings of John's departure, and again when the same busy-body announced his marriage with the daughter of a New England emigrant. The first had well nigh called forth an exclamation, but when the last came, she had no power to speak; she felt the blood recede from her cheek to her heart, and there was a choking sensation in her throat, which she could not master. But that spasm passed away, and whatever might have been her inward struggles, there was no visible sign that it had affected her, if we except a calmer and less mirthful demeanor.

For nearly two years she toiled on with unremitting industry, the pride and admiration of the village; and more than one had sought to share the arduous duties she had undertaken, for 'so dutiful a daughter,' they reasoned, 'could not fail to make a good wife.' But Hannah steadily resisted all importunities; she had borne to part with the first loved, and it required no exertions to refuse other proposals. But ere the second year of her filial self-devotion had expired, a third stroke of palsy carried the old man to his grave, and Hannah's whole attention was now directed to her remaining parent. But the old woman missed the companion of forty years—she listened in vain for the sound of his voice, reading and praying, and joining its tremulous tones with Hannah's in the evening hymn. She could no longer apply herself to her knitting, for her thoughts would wander back to those bygone years of happiness, her work would drop upon her knee, and thus she would sit listlessly for hours, while Hannah strove in vain to rouse her. She did not long survive the aged partner of her pilgrimage, and they lie side by side in the village grave-yard, within a stone's throw of the spot where they were born, lived and died! Hannah was now left entirely alone. Her brothers offered her a home in their families, but she could not bear to leave the village, where every spot teemed with associations to her mind; and at their request she became a member of the family of a friend of her parents. A year passed away, and Hannah was again tranquil and comparatively happy,—when John Evans returned to Heathside, a widower. He re-opened his old shop, resumed his business and called upon Hannah Lee. The substance of their first interview was kept carefully in their own bosoms; but John's visits became frequent, and ere the lapse of many months, it all resulted in Hannah Lee's becoming the wife of the widowed lover of her youth. The cottage which would have been their home, had their marriage taken place three years before, had now another occupant, but the old house by the church which had been the home of her father and her father's father, the scene of all her childish joys and sorrows, and the trials of her maturer years, was now vacant, and it soon became Hannah's bridal abode, and the home of her wedded life.

Time passed, and fortune smiled upon the village blacksmith and his wife; a group of rosy, happy children clustered around their hearth, and filled the house with music—they had been enabled to purchase the old homestead and an adjoining field which afforded pasture to the cow, while in the yard might be heard the cackling of Hannah's poultry; for her nice yellow butter and fresh eggs found a ready market in the adjoining town, and thus added to the store which they were laying up against a rainy day. That day came at last! twice seven years of happiness rolled away, and then the surly dame Misfortune, as if envious of their prosperity, dashed the cup from their lips and substituted her own in its stead. The first stroke fell, and from a quarter whence it was least expected. John Evans, now in the prime of life, had become a person of no small importance in his native village. Since his marriage he had beguiled the long winter evenings by reading books which were loaned him by the minister, himself a deep read and intellectual man, though lowly in heart and content to pass his life among the humble people with whom his lot had been cast. In this manner, and by the conversation of travellers who in passing through the village always stopped to gaze at and admire his brawny, muscular person, and the intelligence which beamed forth from his face, spite of the smoke and dirt with which it was begrimed, he had gathered a considerable store of information. But the reading in which he most delighted, was the history of his own country, and he felt the patriotic fire kindle in his veins, and his blood thrill as he read of her noble struggles for independence and her final glorious triumph! Of this subject he never tired; his voice grew strong and his step proud as he descanted upon it, and he often regretted that he had not been old enough in those days to bear a musket and go forth to the fight. About this time the last war in which so many now living were engaged, broke out, and parties were out in different sections of the country in search of recruits. Heathside did not pass unscathed; a small detachment of soldiers took up their quarters at the village inn, and stirred up the martial spirit in the breasts of the male portion of the community; many a sturdy youth exchanged the plough for the musket, and the coarse blue frock for the knapsack, and went forth to the conflict from which perchance he might never return! Day after day the recruiting serjeant might be seen at John Evans' forge, pouring into his listening ear tales of wild adventure and all the charms of a soldier's life. The blacksmith was fascinated and his wife distressed; and it was no surprise though a terrible shock, when John informed her that he had enlisted. Tears, expostulations and entreaties were alike in vain; his mind was filled with visions of glory, and he panted to go forth, to fight and conquer. My memory does not extend back to that time, but I have heard my mother speak of the sorrow that pervaded the village the day the recruits marched out. Wives clung to their departing husbands, parents implored their sons not to desert them, maidens gazed, half dead with terror, on the lovers who might never return to redeem their vows, and children, ignorant of their own loss, wept in sympathy with their distressed parents; while the sound of drum and fife playing merrily the national air, rung in their ears like the death knell of all they loved. Alas! how few of that goodly company returned with unbroken constitutions and unmaimed limbs to their homes.

There is an old saying, that 'misfortunes never come singly,' and the blacksmith's family seemed to verify the truth of the remark. Soon after the departure of the recruits, a contagious disorder appeared among children, and the young Evans' were not exempt from its effects. The youngling of the flock passed from the home where her presence had been as sunshine, and those who braved the disorder were long confined to the house. The attentions they required were so unremitting, that Mrs. Evans was obliged to neglect her other affairs, and when at length her family were restored to health, then came the long apothecary's bill, and other numerous expenses necessarily incurred, and she was obliged to sell, first her cow and then the field which her industry had helped to buy. The homestead alone remained, and to retain this, Hannah was obliged to rally all her energies. She had always been famed for her skill as a laundress, and she found no difficulty in obtaining employment in that vocation. Her eldest girl assisted her, and twice a week went to the next town with a little wicker car such as is now used to draw infants, and thus brought the soiled clothes, and carried back the clean ones. The two eldest boys hired themselves out to farmers during the summer months, and went to school in the winter, and the third went to the parsonage to do errands and the light chores; while the youngest girl braided straw for a manufactory in an adjacent town, an occupation in which her mother and sister shared when the heavier labors of the day were over. All this was a considerable help, though in order to keep her children at school every winter and to clothe them neatly, Mrs. Evans was obliged to toil unremittingly; but she never repined, and would have been comparatively happy, but for her disquietude concerning her husband. Since the first six months of his absence, she had heard nothing from him; the war had long been ended, and many of the recruits had returned, but they brought no intelligence of John Evans, for soon after their arrival at head-quarters, he had been placed in a different regiment, and they knew nothing of his future fate.

Five years, the time for which he had enlisted expired; and one hot, sultry day in August, Hannah stood ironing at her long deal table, her eldest daughter was busily plaiting ruffles at one end, and at the other by the open casement, sat Hetty the younger girl, trimming a straw bonnet, when the latter, looking up, saw a lame, weary and apparently broken down man, crossing the road that led to their cottage. He paused a moment at the wicket gate and looked wistfully round, then hobbled up the gravel-path, and before Hetty's surprise and curiosity would allow her to speak, he was at the door. 'Who can he be?' she exclaimed, as she rose to open it, and her mother and sister lifted their eyes from their work just as the man inquired, after regarding the girl intently for an instant, if Mrs. Hannah Evans had removed. One sound of that voice was enough; scarred, seamed and mutilated as he was, the eye and ear of love were too keen to be deceived, and Hannah with tears of joy welcomed her husband once more to his home. The news of his return spread like wildfire through the village. John, the eldest son, now an apprentice in the shop where his father had formerly been master, threw down the huge sledge hammer, and without waiting to throw off his leather apron, or even to wash his face and hands, ran with the speed of lightning homewards, James hurried from the fields, and Bob heard the news in the distant meadow, where he was cutting peat, and darted off hatless and barefooted to greet the long absent and deeply mourned father. All work was suspended for that afternoon; the wanderer was worn with travel and hunger, so the tea-table was set, with the strong and refreshing beverage, good home-made bread, potatoes and smoking rashers of bacon, and never met a happier group than that which gathered around the humble but well spread board in the cottage of John and Hannah Evans. When the table was cleared, and the family were seated in the 'best room,' inhaling the fresh air that came through the open casements, rendered more fragrant by its passage through the honeysuckles which climbed even to the lowly roof, how eagerly did they listen to all the father had to relate of his adventures since he left them. The recital, however, occupied but little time, great as his sufferings had been. He had been taken prisoner in a skirmish after a stout resistance, and for many months had languished in an English prison, in a cold, damp cell, which had the effect most certainly, of damping his martial spirit, and making him sigh most heartily for the comforts of his own happy fireside, and the society of his wife and children. Thus deprived alike of the companionship of his own race and of books, cramped up in the narrow limits of his cell, pining for fresh air and active exercise, sick and desponding, he remained till the declaration of peace, and an exchange of prisoners set him at liberty—to return to the army. But the spirit which had formerly incited him, was now quelled or dormant, and but for the disgrace which must accrue to his family as well as to himself, he would certainly have deserted. With a heavy and cheerless heart he toiled on. He wrote several letters, but received no answer, which added to his dejection, and when at length his time of service was at an end, he was unfit to commence his journey home. His illness increased, and he was taken to the hospital, and after lingering there for several weeks, he was discharged, and set off on foot for his native village. How different from the hale and hearty man who had gone forth full of health and vigor, was he who returned with his head whitened though not by the snows of three-score winters, foot-sore, and lame from the effect of wounds which had been aggravated by neglect, and so changed that none but the true and loving wife could have recognized him.

But now he was again at home, surrounded by comfort and by the dear ones for whose presence he had so yearned, and for that night at least, all care and regrets were given to the wind. As soon as he was rested from his fatigue, John began to seek employment; he was gladly hired as foreman in the shop where he had formerly been master, and for several months he wrought at the forge as diligently as in the days of his youth. But as the winter advanced, a chronic disease, engendered by prison-damps and want of proper food and exercise, attacked him, paralysed his limbs, and utterly disabled him for work. Again John was cast down and again Hannah rallied all her powers to cheer him.

'Don't fret, John dear,' she would say, 'we have still the old house over our heads, I have my health and strength and plenty to do, and our children, God bless them, are able not only to support themselves, but to add something weekly to the common stock; and sure I am, neither of them would ever see us want. Think how many of our neighbors are poorer than we; there is old Janet Lewis, with neither chick nor child, compelled to seek an asylum for her old age in the almshouse; and Robert Lane shaking with palsy and no wife or daughter to take care of him, and see that he is kept clean and comfortable. Indeed, John, we have a great deal to be thankful for ;'—and John would assent to all she said, and reproach himself for murmuring. It was not in the nature of such a man to sit idle and inactive, and he soon set about laying plans for gaining at least his own subsistence. He tried to devise some way in which he could assist his wife, but failed ; and at last he hit on an expedient which he thought might be rendered feasible. He possessed considerable ingenuity, and his sons having procured at his request some blocks of wood, he had his arm-chair wheeled to the window, and began to carve out boys with his jack-knife. When Hetty went to town the next week, he commissioned her to take them to a toy-shop, and see if the master could dispose of them. She did so, and was successful—and the shopkeeper told her if these met with a ready sale, he would employ her father constantly. The articles were soon found to be saleable, and John had as much as he could do to answer the demand. Employment and independence, humble as it was, soon restored him to cheerfulness, and he ceased to repine at his afflictions.

Many years have passed away since we first introduced the reader to the old brown cottage, and it has still much the same appearance, save that the velvet moss lies thicker and heavier on the roof, and the woodbine and honeysuckle hang in richer profusion around the casements ; but the inmates have not been exempt from the general law of change. The eldest son is now proprietor of the blacksmith's shop and is married to his master's daughter ; the second, James, is settled on a small farm in the outskirts of the village, and Robert, the youngest, who always loved books better than either work or play, is usher in the grammar school of B—, with a prospect of being, some day, at the head of the institution. Hetty, too, the lady of the family, as all the villagers call her, and as she doubtless esteems herself, is the wife of a city merchant, and lives in style in the metropolis, and Sarah alone, the good, kind, gentle Sarah, the 'elder sister,' lives at home a quiet, contented, happy old maid, with apparently not a wish beyond the walls of the humble cottage where she was born. Old John Evans still sits in his accustomed seat, the old arm-chair by the window, with a placid smile upon his wan face, but his fingers are no longer busy with the knife and wood—his hands rest listlessly on his knees, and there is a vacancy in his look as he turns his head from side to side, when any one addresses him, to ascertain in what direction they are. Another affliction has fallen upon him, and John Evans is blind ! but he has learnt resignation, and many a lesson of wisdom do his aged lips impart to those around him. And old Hannah Evans ? It is long since she was introduced to our readers, and few of them, I fancy, would be able to recognize in her now, the original of the portrait then drawn. The snows of three-score winters have thinned and whitened the auburn locks of her youth, and they are put carefully back, beneath a simple muslin cap ; time has ploughed furrows, many and deep on the once broad, smooth brow and the ruddy cheek, from which the peach bloom tint has also departed—the merry light has faded from her eyes, but in its place they wear an expression of calm, chastened and serious thought—her once tall, plump figure, is attenuated and bowed with the weight of years and sorrow, and a rheumatic affection which has settled in her hip, produces constant and intense pain.

Yet amid all her sufferings it is a beautiful and touching sight, to witness her devotion to her husband, who, as she says, is even more afflicted than herself. No attention that she can possibly pay him, will she allow her daughter to render ; for his sake, in the midst of her sharpest pangs, when her whole frame quivers, and her brow is knit with agony, she represses the slightest groan or exclamation, and could he see, I really believe she would obtain sufficient command over the muscles of her face to prevent even a look of anguish, lest it should pain the beloved one. Her own hands prepare his simple food, and administer it too, for so helpless has he become, that he is obliged to be dressed, washed, and fed like a child, and when these offices are performed, and she has combed his long silver locks and parted them smoothly on his broad, high forehead, she seats herself at his side, and with the Bible on the stand before her, knits and reads at the same time. And on the pleasant Sabbaths in summer, when Sarah has gone to church, she seats him in his chair by his favorite window, beneath which she has planted the flowers he loves best, and with little glass vases filled with blossoms, and a box of mignonette on the window seat, she places herself beside him, and they talk cheerily of the past with its many memories, sad or pleasant. They recount all the incidents of their childish days when they played together, of their pleasant days of courtship, and all the years of mingled trial and happiness they have spent together since they were wedded ; they speak of the blessings they enjoy in such good and loving children, and in the reverence and affection of their grand-children ; and they look forward with calm, quiet joy to the time when they shall sleep together in the green church-yard, which is ever within their view, and which is to them no darksome place, but a pleasant passage to a brighter and better world. Thus with no vain regrets for the past, and no idle fears for the future, they look cheerily forward to the close of their earthly pilgrimage, with but one prayer, that when the sun sets upon the death bed of the one, it may never rise upon the living survivor.

I am well aware that I have not done justice to the original in this feeble sketch, but I could not resist the temptation to pay at least this small tribute to her virtues ; and with this for a ground-work, let the reader picture to herself a true-hearted woman, 'faithful unto the end' in every vocation to which she is called—one from whom many a young wife, ay and many an old too, might learn useful lessons of meekness, forbearance, gentleness, kindness and earnest love, an embodiment of all that is beautiful and good, and pure, and true in woman, and then christen your ideal, the faithful auld wife—Hannah Evans.

SONNET TO AN INFANT.

ROSETTA.

WELCOME—stranger, thou art entering,
On a path that's thickly strewn;
Flowers and brambles where thou'rt venturing,
All the way hath overgrown.
Bright and beautiful it seemeth
When it bursts upon the sight,
And 'tis lovely; yet it teemeth,
With illusions false as bright.
Ere thy hand shall pluck the roses,
Tempting thee with sweetest breath,
See each shining fold discloses,
No rude thorn whose touch is death.
God bless thee! sinless one—and strength impart,
To struggle onward with a guileless heart. C. W. H.

GOSSIPINGS OF IDLE HOURS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

HOOR TENTH.

THIS is a most bewilderingly beautiful day, Louise. Let us up to the summit of the hill, where we can be above, yet not shut out from the busy world around. I have no sympathy with the life of a recluse. If I were the most religious person in the world, I would not be a nun. I believe with Franklin, that the most acceptable service we can render God, is to do good to our fellow beings; and how can we do them good, to any great extent, unless we mingle with them, and share with their pursuits?—I never could see the superior piety of those persons who devote their whole, or indeed the greater portion of their time, to self-examination and self-improvement. It is true, no higher duty exists than to make ourselves perfect; but how can this duty be accomplished so long as we devote ourselves entirely to selfish ends? entirely to our own mental and moral refinement?

It is my creed, Louise—would to God I more fully practised it in my daily life!—that the very highest responsibility of our being is to make those in the sphere of our influence, happy. The question we ought to consider when reflecting on the result of any action, is not, 'Shall I be rewarded for it?'—but, 'Will it be useful to any human being?'

That we owe ourselves certain duties, I am aware. There are practical virtues, whose performance extends scarcely beyond our own individual knowledge and benefit. We owe it to ourselves to be temperate, cleanly, and in every respect orderly; to be well-instructed in religious faith, and in scientific and historic knowledge. Still, all these virtues and acquirements have an indirect bearing upon the happiness of those around us. We are so connected, every individual of us, with the great mass of human life in the world, that even our personal habits do more or less affect the general comfort and tranquillity of those with whom we mingle.

But I am prosing—and here we are now, on the very brow of this high hill. Let us have a seat on this crooked apple-tree. Years ago, Louise, a friend sat with me here, and I can show you now the spot where he cut from its bark a fragment of green, velvety moss. 'If I go over the seas to other lands,' said he, 'I will look upon this little relic there, and think of you.' I should like to know if he is looking on it now, thinking of me. A blessing on him, though the waters be between us. Would there were in this world, no less faithful friends than he!

Look up, Louise, into the deep, blue sky! What a mystery is day, that shrouds from our gaze the myriad worlds that are forever moving through that stupendous arch! Day was made for our earth, to show us the minute loveliness spread everywhere upon its bosom; Night for the million-sphered universe; for the display of suns and worlds a hundred-fold more magnificent and glorious than our own! Day is for the beauty of the rose, for the song of the lark; Night comes 'With every star,

Making the streams that in their noonday track
Give but the moss, the reed, the lily back,
Mirrors of worlds afar!'

Is there not, to you, something almost terrific in the sublimity of astronomic truths? I confess, limited as is my knowledge of that Olympic science, I am thrilled and awed to the soul by the novelty and magnitude of its discoveries. I could almost wish, sometimes, that this universe were less stupendous; that its creation and operations were not so deeply veiled from human investigation. How natural was that ejaculation of the Psalmist—'When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers; the moon and stars which thou hast made; what is man that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man that thou visitest him?'

BE ye one and all, lovers of justice, doers of mercy, and happy recipients of the bounties of God! PR.

HUMAN LIFE.

I've seen at early dawn
A sky of stainless hue,
And the broad arch above,
Of pure cerulean blue,
Long ere the coming eve
With darkening clouds o'ercast,
While wild and fiercely blew
The tempest's fearful blast.

I've seen the little bark
With light and snowy sail,
Gaily with seeming pride
Ride on the swelling gale;
But ere an hour had passed,
The angry billows roar,
And deep beneath the wave
It sinks to rise no more.

I've seen the fair young bride
In health and beauty stand,
On him who'd won her heart
Gladly bestow her hand;
But ere a year had passed,
She changed her bridal dress,
In yon bright spirit world,
For a robe of righteousness.

I've heard the mother's voice,
In accents soft and mild,
Beseeching heaven to bless
Her only darling child!
Just as his little voice
Had learned to lisp her name,
I've seen her, bathed in tears,
Stand o'er his lifeless frame.

I've seen a female friend
Spend all her better days
In deeds for which she gained
The just award of praise;
But envy saw her fame,
And aimed its poisonous dart,
With slander's cruel aim,
At that lone female heart.

And such is human life!
'Tis but a changing scene;
To earthly minds its joys
Seem few and far between.
But to the trusting heart
This precious boon is given,
To look beyond the ken,
And make of earth a heaven.

DESTRUCTION OF THE WORLD BY FIRE.

THE vagaries of Miller have brought out a great multitude of Essays and Disquisitions on the Destruction of the World, in which the imagination of man has run as wild a riot as when the wide spread mania against which these productions were written originated. Some of these productions are evidently the fruits of minds undisciplined by any real love of truth, or serious regard to it as the most precious of all things—as the divine agent of all Progress. These aim at confounding the 'Millerites,' but do nothing at convincing; they deal much in the negative, but not at all in the positive. They seem to regard it as useful to keep alive fear and terror—to preserve those awful apprehensions which make men tremble as on the brink of a bottomless abyss, and eager to grasp any thing which promises to support them from falling therein. These are brought forth by proselyters. Other of these essays appear to come from the philosophical temperament, as they treat of the burning up of the world as coolly as the merits of an ice cream is discussed in a summer garden bower. They bid us not be alarmed, as all things are governed by Wisdom, but they fail to show us an Affectionate Wisdom—that kind of wisdom which we must perceive ere we can be at rest under the prospect of any calamity. We need a faith whose instinct shall be to prompt us to be ready for flight, as when the shell of the embryo bird of the desert is broken, he wings his way far above and beyond the ruin. We need to look up to God as the great Father, ere we can think submissively of a 'wreck of matter,' and a 'crush of worlds.' Whatever fails to give us this faith, will in vain call upon us to tremble not, in view of the destruction of the material world. It is not in our nature not to tremble, till we feel secure of desirable life; we must be in terror as we think of our immortality and the ruin of the terrestrial, if we have no sure hope of glory eternal.

In the last Christian Examiner there is an article on 'The Destruction of the World by Fire,' which proposes to accomplish considerable, although but a little more than eight pages are given to the whole matter. It opens with the statement,—'that a violent end is appointed for the present system of created things, has been a theme of poetry, and even of philosophy, from the remotest times.' The writer proposes to inquire into the origin of this opinion, to trace its history from the feeblest intimations down to the glaring errors of the present day, and to close with citing the practical principles which the subject ought to suggest. A vast matter for so small a space.

It will be observed that the writer starts with the idea that a 'violent end' is 'appointed for the present system and order of created things.' The origin of such an opinion is proposed to be given. Now, it seems to my mind that a christian minister should

'LITTLE KINDNESSES. Happy is he who always means there shall be an affectionate meaning even in "the soon forgotten charity of a kiss," and whose heart of affection gives pulses to his hand whenever he clasps another in the courtesies of life. He shall "be free from the great transgression."' Truly, little kindnesses well up to a fountain.

open the Bible and point to the record, if record there be, or present some reasonable ground from the researches of science, for speaking of such an appointment; but instead of this, we are told that it 'seems natural' to look for the cause in some terrible revolution which befel the old world, and in the impressions of dread which it must have left on the minds of men.' This is the origin of what is treated of as an appointment of God! 'Men naturally associate,' says the writer, 'the memorials of the Deluge with a looking forward to the destruction of the world by Fire!' That is, because a fearful judgment came on the gross wickedness of a corrupted world, therefore it is natural to look forward to the destruction of the world by fire! I cannot understand this, if it does not convey an idea the most repulsive to christian faith and trust; and were I to adopt it, a new language would be given to the bow in the clouds! It would no longer shine in beauty to tell me of the Creator's promise of love, but would suggest an idea so awful as completely to rob the mind of all enjoyment, as the eye gazed on the pathway of angels. I must also marvel that the Deity did not add a prophecy of the future destruction by fire, for if the covenant meant anything, it was designed to take away all dread which was and is incompatible with the true enjoyment of life.

When the writer informs us that it is natural to expect another convulsion as the mind was impressed by the fact of the deluge, he cites 2 Peter iii. 5-7, as proof of the union of the two ideas;—'By the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water; whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished. But the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire, against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men.' In direct connection with this citation, the writer says, 'We are aware that some interpreters have been willing to see,' (is this an intimation which questions their honesty?) 'in this picture of a flaming universe, only a description in bright colors of the destruction of Jerusalem, or of great political convulsions.' (Rather, a great overthrow of church and state.) 'Such an interpretation betrays a great inattention to the history of ancient opinions, and is one of a thousand proofs to show how easily men find that only in the Bible which they are predisposed to find.' Why not give some specimens of ancient opinions from the Old Testament? None can be given.

The remark I have italicised, is one of those common flings which are thrown out in the absence of any thing rational. When an opinion is against our own, it is very easy to say that men are willing to think as they do—that their predispositions were in favor only of such an opinion; but it is sometimes more difficult to establish the truth of an opposite idea. It might be readily surmised, that the writer of that sentence was predisposed in favor of the opinion he regards as supported by Peter's words, for he refers much to heathen poets and writers, but not at all to the Bible. When we are willing to see in Isaiah's sublime language, chapter xxxiv. 4, a reference to the judgments visited on Idumea, we may be deemed as merely willing so to regard it, and not as being convinced that such was its only reference. Read the prophet's magnificent imagery—imagery necessary to strike with force the mind of those who should be interested in the prophecy;—'Their slain also shall be cast out, and the mountains shall be melted with their blood. And ALL the hosts of heaven shall be DISSOLVED, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll; and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from a fig tree.' The next verse gives the reference: 'For my sword shall be bathed in heaven; behold, it shall come down upon Idumea, and upon the people of my curse, to judgment.' See also to the end of the thirty-fourth chapter.

When the New Testament writers treat of judgments, if we go to the Old Testament to learn the key to their imagery, we shall find no difficulty in understanding them. But if we choose to roam the world, and plunge into the vagaries of heathen poets and the fancies of darkened minds, we must not wonder if the letter kills all cheerful thought. To interpret Peter's language as justifying the idea that it is natural to associate with the deluge the future destruction of the world by fire, is to take an entirely unspiritual view of his language. It is to overlook all the passages in the prophets which are parallel to it, and isolate it contrary to every rule of correct interpretation.

The literal material world did not perish by the deluge. It was the people who perished by the flood, and hence the prophecy of our Lord when he treated of the judgment then coming on the Jews, Matt. xxiv. 36-39. Peter designed a similar allusion in the language which is deemed so strongly in favor of the idea of the destruction of the world by fire. To use it in support of this latter opinion, is to turn the Apostle into a philosopher, and make him predict a physical change in the world, when his whole object was to clothe the disciples with patience in view of the nearness of the spiritual change which was so much desired, and against the approach of which many obstacles seemed to exist. He speaks of some who tauntingly asked after the coming of Christ in his kingdom, and he refers the disciples to the consideration that thus it was in Noah's time; the jeering sons of iniquity made use of what might seem a delay of judgment, but the judgment did in God's time come, and after it a new order of things was produced. Peter uses no stronger language than Isaiah and St. John. Compare Isa. lxxv. 17; lxxvi. 22, with Rev. xxi. 1, &c. It is the language of high wrought and sublime poetry.

By neither of these passages, nor by any other of the prophetic declarations concerning convulsions, overthrows and ruins, is meant a reference to the burning up of the material world; but they all intimate great changes among the people referred to, in accordance with the infinite designs of a wonder working God. Though the imagery is celestial, the reality is terrestrial; and it would be well to learn one lesson therefrom, to rightly look up that we may rightly labor around us—by heavenward thought to spiritualize the earth, that it may reflect more of heaven's order and beauty.

Now let it be particularly observed, that after Peter has used the startling imagery concerning the heavens passing away, &c., he says, 'Nevertheless, we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.' The question then is—Where is the record of the promise? Is there any promise on record where the creating of new heavens and a new earth, is connected with the literal, actual burning up of the material world? If there is, then some proof can be adduced in favor of what I have treated as a gross error. Where is there such a promise? No where, but in the vagaries of heathen poets, and the fancies of those who can leap from the Deluge to Peter's epistle, when treating of the origin and history of an opinion. By referring to a passage already alluded to, we can see a specimen of what was promised in connection with a new creation; Isa. lxxv. 17-25. This is a description of what is uniformly described as to follow the destruction symbolized by celestial and terrestrial commotions, beautifully summed up in a few words by Haggai, ii. 6, 7, 'Thus saith the Lord of Hosts; Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land; and I will shake all nations, and the Desire of all nations shall come; and I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of hosts.' Bishop Lowth remarks that great changes in public affairs are represented in prophetic poetry by great natural events; 'if,' says he, 'the subject be the destruction of the Jewish empire by the Chaldeans, or a strong denunciation of ruin against the enemies of Israel, it is depicted in exactly the same colors, as if universal nature were about to relapse into the primeval chaos.' It was to promises couched in such lofty imagery, to which Peter referred, when we spake of a ground of trust that a glorious order of things would follow the changes predicted. A new heaven—new church; new earth, new governments; were to be established by the setting up Christianity as the permanent and universal religion. This surely is intimated by Peter's language where he says he wrote to stir up the pure minds of the disciples, by way of remembrance, that they might be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets. He reiterates those words—those prophecies, and it was natural for him to do it in similar language—in similar lofty imagery, making the believer to feel that nothing but the might of God could accomplish a work represented in such awful colors.

But some may thus emphasise Peter's expression—'The heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved, &c., and by thus emphasising the passage, deem it strong against any opinion. But I would ask, Were the material heavens and earth which were then, when Peter wrote, not in existence before? Did the flood destroy the solar system? Did it quench the stars, and put out the sun? No one will presume that such a power was exerted by it, for the ark rode on the waters, and the eye that looked up when the clouds departed, saw the same sun shine, or the same stars twinkling in the firmament, as before the ark was entered. The contrast instituted by Peter was something different from what it is said to be by those who count him a prophet of a dissolving universe. What, also let it be inquired, What did he mean by the expression—'by the same word'? Did he not mean the same word, or record, which contained the account of the Deluge? A critic, of extensive learning, says—'There can be no reasonable doubt that by "his word" is equivalent to "according to his word," i. e. his written word.' He tells us that all modern editions of the Greek Testament exhibits a reading which is rendered as above, 'by his word,' instead of 'by the same word.' Where then is the prophecy from which Peter quoted, if he referred to the conflagration of the solar system? And if his language is to be made unpoetical—different from the usual prophetic style and materialized, then we are bound not only to speak of the burning up of the globe, but of the conflagration of the heavens! How will this coincide with the notions of riding on the clouds and returning to the earth after a renovation? But Peter spake not literally; he spake metaphorically. He maintained, that the prophecy of the coming calamity was not only spoken by Christ, but that the same record which told of the change wrought in the past by the Noachic deluge, contained information of other changes in the future by fire. Fire is a common term for consuming judgments. Jerusalem is called a furnace where it is said, 'The Lord's fire is in Zion, and his furnace in Jerusalem.' Isa. xxxi. 9. See also Ezek. xxii. 17-22. And if the reader will turn to Nahum i. 5, a record will be found where a judgment is predicted by the burning of the earth, the world and all that dwell therein. In the fulfillment of the catastrophe alluded to by Peter, literal fire did constitute an element of destruction. 'In the passing away of the Jewish symbolical heavens and earth, the conflagration of the temple by the hands of the Roman soldiers, and the perishing of thousands in its flames, attested the presence of fire as a ministry of wrath.' In passing, it may be well to remark, that Peter in applying his language, represents the Christians as looking for such things as described, but we have no reason to believe that they looked for a universal conflagration; if they did, they were in an error; for in what sense could it be said, that they were hasting unto the day of the Lord? But if Peter spake metaphorically, as Jesus did, of the then approaching terrible judgment, the fiery trial, it was just for him to say to the disciples, 'Ye, therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness; but grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.'

But to return to the writer in the Examiner. After rebuking those who see a description of the destruction of Jerusalem, in bright colors, in Peter's 'picture of a flaming universe,' he makes it refer to the globe. Why did Peter speak of the 'heavens being on fire' and 'dissolving,' if the globe only was referred to? He that regards that language as literal, ought to take in the whole idea; and not while rebuking others for seeing a small matter in a mighty vision, see only such himself.

After the writer has accounted for the origin of the opinion alluded to, the time is also alluded to, and this is to be 'when iniquities shall sufficiently abound.' Here is all that any enthusiast, who deems this a wicked age, would ask as authority for running up and down the earth, prophesying the speedy end of all things, and for bending predictions of calamities to his time.

The next question is, Why should fire be chosen as the instrument of the general ruin? The Hindoos choose to speak of another flood, but destruction by fire is the most prevalent opinion in the world. 'The principle of contrast might have led to it.' A great and forcible reason, truly! 'It was natural also that the mightiest of the elements should be chosen for so tremendous an overthrow.' 'There are besides many appearances on our planet and beyond it, calculated to inspire apprehension from this agent, rather than from the other.' 'No bounds have been fixed for that fiercer element.' 'Internal fires are laboring in the heart of the earth. They break out in volcanoes.' I know a very excellent lady who believes that volcanoes were made to destroy the world with. As well might we regard the safety valves of a steam engine as made to blow up the engine and destroy the train. Volcanoes are the breathing holes of the earth—the safety valves of the globe. The writer next alludes to meteors and comets—to fiery phenomena which no philosophy can explain, as suggesting reasons why fire will be the agent to destroy the world. And thus he accounts for the origin of the doctrine he maintains. What a profound silence has he kept in reference to the Living Force enthroned above all. But once has he opened the Bible, and then places side by side with sacred writ a sybilline oracle.

But I confess myself bewildered when I come to the writer's 'practical principles.' He tells us we have no business, or that it is not our province, to 'look to the end of things created.' Shall we not heed the Apostle's exhortation and warning as he has explained it? We cannot but have our imaginations awakened when we feel that it is true that beneath us fires are gathering to destroy the world—especially when the guilt of man is so great—when the cry of near three millions of bound humanity rises from a little spot called the land of the free!

I am bewildered again, when I find the writer speaking thus at the close of his article; 'It' (this lower world) 'may wax old as doth a garment, and perish like its inhabitants under the weight of years; or a sudden calamity may overwhelm it and change it utterly, or it may go on in its own bright order forever.' How can this uncertainty be, if the writer's use of Peter's language be correct? Is it but as a mere sybilline oracle?

But I must close, rejoicing in the sublime prophecies which are yet to be fulfilled on this earth. This globe is to be the theatre of God-glorifying deeds. The time is to come when peace and good will shall prevail, and the will of the Father be the delight of the reconciled family. 'Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree; and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off.'

'THE GOLDEN VASE.'

I RECEIVED a few days since a letter from a young friend, in which she says, 'I send you with this my New Year's present, Miss H. F. Gould's Golden Vase, thinking you would like to read it.' A beautiful title for a book, thought I, and what I know of the author, (I dislike the word authoress) leads me to suppose that the contents are worthy of the pretty receptacle. I had been told it was designed for the young, and so I opened it rather to gratify my kind little friend, than with a hope that it could profit a child of larger growth; but though I opened it at the suggestion of another, I finished it to please myself, and glad was I to find that my heart had not grown too old for its simple and beautiful lessons. Any one may learn the pleasure of doing good from the story of 'Mary and the Sparrow.' Mary took as she supposed a dead bird from the gravel walk, but she soon ascertained that life was not quite extinct in its little bosom, and by dropping cold water on its head and beak, she imparted almost new life to the tender thing. She put it in a blanket, and laid it aside, and had quite forgotten it, when it darted out like an arrow and sought its leafy home. It soon returned with parents, brothers and sisters, thus showing its lively gratitude. Any man or boy may learn a useful lesson from the conduct of the kind hearted coachman who unwittingly exposed his system of management in a few words, 'I never fret my horses and so they never fret me.' Miss Gould has the happy faculty of adorning the most ordinary incidents of life with the bright coloring of her own graceful imagination, and the most common objects and occurrences become poetical when treated upon by her magical pen. The Golden Vase is an appropriate and valuable book for the young, and let not the more advanced overlook its humble pretensions, for they will gather from its perusal sweet lessons of faith and duty, and feel the tide of early joyousness and innocence flow back in a refreshing tide upon their hearts.

RUTH AND BOAZ.

AN ILLUSTRATION OF THE PLATE.

THERE was a famine in Israel when the Judges ruled, and strange tales of luxuriance and plenty came to the people from the land of Moab. The tales were believed, and Elimelech, with his wife and their two sons, went forth to journey thither, bidding farewell to Bethlehem, with tears, vowing soon to return to its hallowed ground.

The land of Moab was greeted by the exiles, and its pleasant fields where the bending grain waved like a sea of gold, gladdened the pilgrims, bidding the spectre of haggard want depart. The song of industry rang loud and clear, and their habitation was a happy one. 'Give us this day our daily bread.'

Darkness is in the house of Elimelech, but not the darkness of night. He has lain down to die; as by his head Naomi stands, and on either side Mahlon and Chilion, the Hebrew would willingly close his eyes, were he in his own land. He dreads to be buried in a strange soil where the step will not be softened as the foot passes over his resting place—he cannot bear the thought that his grave will be deserted when they shall return to Bethlehem again. But he remembers that God is every where, and, blessing the loved ones, he turns to the East, and sleeps the last sleep. 'May you die among your kindred!'

There is joy in the home of the exiles. The preparations are for the marriage rite. It would be a most happy time to Naomi were it not for the fear that a curse may come upon the house through the union of her sons with a strange people. Yet they are beautiful maidens, and the affection which drew their hearts to her sons is pure. Why should she doubt? The rite is attended to and the mother gives her blessing. How little the issues of the time are known!

Ten years have passed, and again there is darkness in the home of Naomi, the pleasant one. Her sons are dead, and on either side is a widow. Now, bereft of husband and sons, she thinks of the land where she was ever joyous—where the living kindred dwell. But how can she leave the dead? How can she turn away for the last time from the graves of the loved? Rest in peace!

The Lord has visited his people and they have bread, Naomi has heard and rejoiced in the grateful story. She resolves—alone and in sorrow—to return to her early home—to greet once more the sweet scenes of unclouded years. She faints not at the thought of the weary miles of desolate land that lie between. She arises and goes forth on her journey, while her daughters-in-law believe not that she can mean to travel the scores of miles that stretch through a drear land. Hope defies difficulty and unites the far off with the near.

Naomi and her daughters-in-law stand where the road bends away from the village towards far off Judah. They cannot permit her to go on alone; they would plead with her to return, but they know it would be in vain. How can they leave to go where they will be regarded with a jealous and severe eye? They resolve to meet all and bear all for the sake of the dead, and for the love of the living. But nay, the mother-in-law would go alone. Alone would she bear the trial before her, in some degree happy to think of them in their mother's home—that they wanted not for life's good—that they will remember the burial places of the precious dead. She kisses them, and bitterly they weep. Life is struggling.

Orpah kisses Naomi, and a tear drops upon the cheek of the mother. She lays her hand on her daughter's head and blesses her in the name of Israel's God. She departs—slowly and mournfully—not venturing to look back, lest she should again falter and resolve to go with the pilgrim. But Ruth clings to the mother of her husband. How firm are her arms twined around her neck. She is bidden to lift up her head—to behold her sister departing, and to follow her; she does but turn her face, while still her head rests on Naomi's bosom, and how beautiful is the heroic look. 'Return, Ruth,' says the mother, 'to thy people and gods.' Still more heroic is the countenance of the daughter, as with untrembling lip she pleads, 'Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God. Where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord bring upon me the greatest evil, if aught but death part thee and me.' Naomi sees she is 'steadfastly minded to go with her,' and she speaks no more against it. They travel on; cheerful thoughts and kind affections wing their feet with speed. Love lessens toil by strengthening the heart.

It is the beginning of the barley harvest. The travellers enter Bethlehem, and the people throng to greet the exile's return, as her name is sounded far and wide. As they come near, they marvel at her altered countenance, and ask, 'Is this Naomi? the Beautiful, the Pleasant One? Mournfully she answers—'Call me not Naomi, call me Mara: for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me. I went out full, but the Lord hath brought me home again empty.' Went out full? Did she not go out when famine was in the land—did she not become an exile to get bread? Yes, but yet her heart was full of happiness, for her affections were satisfied by the presence of her husband and sons. The people understand; they give way for the passing on of the sorrowful with her Moabitess companion. 'Tis home wherever the heart is.'

Again Naomi has a home in Bethlehem, and she blesses God for the faithful one he gave her, proving her love of the dead by fidelity to the living. The gleaners pass by to the fields, and Ruth would go. She asks for the bidding and it is given her—'Go, my daughter.' Industry is the activity of love.

There is a merry time in the harvest fields, where the sickles glitter in the sunlight among the grain, like bright eyes flashing through a veil. The bending files fall as the reaper's hook strikes them, and briskly the work goes on. Here and there are the gleaners seen, joyful to gather what God has forbidden the reapers to take up. Humble industry is as happy with its small gain, as the wealthy owner with his crowded granaries. Life is what we make it.

Ruth is in the portion of the field belonging to Boaz, a kinsman of Naomi's husband. Meekly she gathers as is her fortune to find gleanings. Boaz enters and greets the reapers, and they salute him. He notices Ruth. He looks again, and asks him who is set over the reapers, 'Whose damsel is this?' He replies, 'It is the Moabitish damsel that came back with Naomi out of the country of Moab. She asked leave to glean and gather after the reapers among the sheaves; so she came, and hath continued even from the morning until now, save a little while when she tarried in the house.' Boaz knew her history, and would show that he can appreciate self-sacrifice like hers. He speaks to her, 'Ruth, hearest thou not, my daughter? Go not to glean in another field, neither go from hence, but abide here, fast by my maidens.' He has spoken to the young men not to molest her, and he invites her to go when athirst and drink from the urns of the reapers. Ruth bows before him and asks the wherefore of this favor? 'Thy history hath been told me.' Behold the power of virtue!

There is a pause in the labor of the field. The harvesters are gathered to the simple repast. Bread, a vessel of vinegar, and parched corn, are the all of the feast, and it was enough. Ruth is there. The Master of the reapers waits upon her at the board. She is grateful and satisfied. She rises and departs for the field again. As she is seen in the distance, Boaz speaks to his young men, bidding them permit her to glean even among the sheaves and to reproach her not. 'And let fall, says he, 'also some of the handful on purpose for her, and leave them, that she may glean them, and rebuke her not.' Delicate charity!

It is evening. Ruth is beating out the grain from her gleanings; she has about an ephah of barley. She takes it and goes into the village, in the direction towards her home. Gather up, that nothing of good be lost.

There is joy in the house of Naomi. She is once more the Pleasant One. Ruth has told her the adventures of the day; the mother's surprise at her success in gleaning, yields to other thoughts concerning her own husband's kinsman. She bids Ruth continue in the field of Boaz, for it is good; she almost ventures to prophecy. We prophecy as we know.

Ruth, each day through the barley harvest, gleanes in the field of Boaz, and dwells with her mother-in-law. She gleaned the field, but harvested the affections of Boaz.

Again Naomi is at a marriage rite. Boaz and Ruth are there. The wealth of heart which the one yields, is better than the riches of the other. No more will the Pleasant One ask to be called Mara, bitter, for she rejoices that the pilgrimage of Ruth ends in the home of Boaz. She doubts no more that the blessing of God was on the union of affections in her Moabitish home. How little of his ways are known!

There is yet more joy in the home of Boaz. A babe rests on the bosom of the nurse, and that nurse is Naomi. It is Ruth's son. And God was him: he became the father of Jesse, and Jesse was the father of David, the regal progenitor and illustrious type of the Messiah—'The Root and Offspring of David.'

Even so is human life. After the night, cometh the morning; after tears, smiles; after death, immortality.

THE CHRISTIAN'S HOME.

The earth never was designed for the christian's home. It is a field in which he is sent to labor. Here he spends the heat of the day, and he cannot find his home, until the evening comes and his work is ended. If this earth had been designed for the christian's home, it would have been made a very different place. Would it have been filled with so many snares and miseries? It would have been rendered a peaceful, quiet, and holy habitation. But now, God has prepared for him a better habitation, where nothing shall ever enter to disturb his rest, and where he feels himself forever at home. The christian only sojourns here like a wayfaring man, to lodge for a night, but Heaven is his home, where he has an eternity to spend. Eternity! eternity!! Oh, the boundless thought! How can we settle in the dust as though we were always to continue here? How can we feel otherwise than as strangers and pilgrims on the earth.

EDITOR'S BOOK TABLE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., APRIL, 1843.

The Philosophy of Reform; a lecture, with five discourses upon the same general topic. By Rev. E. H. Chapin. New York: C. L. Stickney. Boston: A. Tompkins. 1843. 18mo. Pp. 136. 37 1-2 cents.

We welcome with peculiar pleasure such volumes as this, inasmuch as they contain much suggestive sentiment and recognize Thought as the chief element of Progress. The subjects discussed in the work are of great moment, and they deservedly receive much and deep attention at the present age, instructing, animating and giving strength to thousands to labor heroically for the highest good of Society and Man. The first part of the volume proposes the discussion of an important theme—The Philosophy of Reform. By the 'Philosophy' of Reform, we understand the author as intending the right comprehension of principles and tendencies, the unfolding of which really retards or aids the correct and strong development of Right, Truth and Goodness. In doing this, he speaks against the strict Conservative, as looking only on the Past and deeming it impossible for any thing to be equal to what has been; and he also speaks against the strict Radical, who also despises the Present, because of glowing visions of the Future that loom up to his far-stretching eye. The true Reformer is neither of these. He recognizes what has been of good—is cautious what of the Past he retains—and what of good is now existing, and labors so to Purify and Perfect, as that an Advancement may be made surely and permanently. In this discussion there are many eloquent passages—the illustrations of particular portions are of great strength and beauty. The discourses are all on kindred subjects, holding up Christianity as the great light to illumine, guide and cheer, in the work of Reform, in all its departments. The author treats of the true grounds of Christian Union, of Intolerance, the Work and the Law of Christianity in the human soul, and the mission of the Gospel. All these are excellent productions, and no one can read them without receiving substantial benefit. The humblest efforts in literature do us good, if an earnest and true spirit breathes in them, how much more those of such marked excellence as this little volume contains!

The Prophecies of Daniel, with their application and fulfilment, illustrated by Profane History. By Rev. L. L. Sadler. Portland: S. H. Colesworthy. Boston: B. B. Mussey. 1843. 12mo. Pp. 152.

This little volume contains a series of Lectures delivered by the author to his society in Portland, and at the time of their delivery attracted, we are told, considerable attention. As published, they form another argument against the vagaries of Miller, and suggest many valuable thoughts. The book opens with a disquisition on Prophecy—a subject not to be hastily considered or settled in a few pages,—and then the prophetic times and seasons mentioned in Daniel are treated of; the next two lectures give us an interpretation of the visions, and the volume closes with a lecture on the prospective view of Jewish History—the advent, labors and death of Christ, the destruction of Jerusalem, the overthrow of the Jewish polity, and the establishment of Christianity. This very brief outline is sufficient to show the interesting character of the subjects discussed.

We are sorry to see such an oversight as in the note to page 46, where twelve times thirty days are made to amount to '365 days and some hours.' In the same note the same numeration is correct. We were surprised to find it stated in this note that 'the fact is not fully known,' how the Jews made their years to correspond to solar time. The matter is clearly treated of in standard works on Jewish antiquities, though it may be not satisfactory to the author. These small matters, however, do not injure the argument of the work, and we notice them only to suggest care. This volume is well printed, highly creditable to the press of Mr. Colesworthy.

Education. Part I. History of Education, ancient and modern. Part II. A plan of culture and instruction, based on Christian principles, and designed to aid in the right education of youth, physically, intellectually, and morally. By H. J. Smith, A. M. New York: Harper and Brothers. 1842. Pp. 340. 'Family Library,' No. 157.

When we take up a work on Education we always turn to the table of contents, and if there be a chapter on Religious Instruction, we read that first. We have always found that in such portions of various works on Education are revealed many of the principles the authors advocate, and the character of the motives they appeal to and strengthen. Thus have we done with the work before us, and the favorable opinion of the author formed therefrom was strengthened by a glance at the whole work. The plan of the work is somewhat novel, and the manner in which it is carried out has enabled the author to present a very interesting production, full of valuable suggestions.

We see by an advertisement of the Harpers, that they intend to publish a cheap edition of the future numbers of the Family Library, in paper covers, at twenty-five cents the volume. It ought to be remembered by those who are preserving an entire set, that the bound volumes will be sold at the same price as formerly, and it is only such that can be kept with care. However, we expect some one will soon invent an instantaneous dog-leaf pressing machine.

Travels in the South of Europe, &c. &c. By Rev. C. Rockwell.

To such as are fond of visiting other lands without leaving their own firesides, we would recommend the above work. His remarks upon Spain are full of interest to those who are conversant with the state of affairs in that ill-fated land. He delineates in bold colors the abuses of the church of Rome, and, drawing from life, with reference to the best authorities, we are ready to exclaim 'How art thou fallen,' and how are thy garments soiled till scarce a white fragment remains! Like the leper, could it find free utterance, it would cry, 'unclean, unclean!' I will briefly remark that we must not judge Catholicism by what we see around us, because here it has not free sway, but, if we would see it carried out, we must turn to the old countries of Europe where its abuses make the heart faint and the soul sick of human degradation. His description of Rome, Naples, Vesuvius, and the disintombed cities are strikingly vivid, and, as far as we can judge, correct. Upon the whole, we have not met with a more interesting work for a long time, and we hope it will be extensively read. H. J. W.

'Documents relating to the (Mass.) State Prison.' 'Seventeenth Annual Report of the Board of Managers of the Prison Discipline Society, Boston.'

We are always grateful to those friends who furnish us with important public documents like the above. They assist in perceiving the moral aspect of the age, and show that great good is being done where but little noise is made. The first named pamphlet above, presents the Inspectors' and Chaplain's Reports. The first details the order and industry of the prisoners, and gives us a good opinion of the discipline of the prison. It contains, however, two paragraphs which made the blood run cold, and which we cannot fail to contrast with the Chaplain's glowing account of a revival in the prison—how all engaged have new zeal in reference to the eternal well being of the guilty. Let some of this zeal be turned in behalf of the insane prisoners, to arouse the public to deeds of mercy—nay, of justice, in their behalf. A year since the General Court was memorialized in their behalf, but nothing was done:—we quote the paragraphs.

'Deranged persons and idiots are sometimes committed by courts, who are undoubtedly ignorant of their actual condition; and occasionally convicts are deprived of their reason during their residence here. The prison affords no means of relieving these unhappy prisoners: as they cannot safely be employed in labor, and are not the subjects of discipline, they are necessarily confined in solitude, which generally aggravates the disease.'

'Other institutions have been established, and munificently endowed by the public, for the relief and cure of insanity, which are constantly mitigating or removing this greatest of human calamities, while in this prison no kind regard is extended to those who are entitled to it equally with the patients of the lunatic asylums. In this prison the insane are forgotten by the public, and sequestered from the humanity of their friends and kindred, and doomed to spend years in hopeless misery.'

The last named pamphlet is a very valuable one. The facts detailed are of great consequence. The improvements made in prisons, here alluded to, are sometimes very singular, and show what attention is paid in some cases to the minutia of things. To instance one, the bars of grates of cells, it is recommended, should always be made of round instead of square iron; 'the light and air are comparatively little intercepted by the bars of a round iron grate. A person not much accustomed to observation on prisons, would scarcely believe it possible that so much of the comfort and improvement of prisons depends on this simple provision of round iron in all the grated windows and doors.'

It seems clear to us, that our papers would do more good, if instead of raising 'a warning voice' against sectarianism in prisons, they would notice some of these matters, and plead that God's sun light be let in to cheer the imprisoned. Guilt, in a dark, damp, cold prison, must make a soul fitted to receive the gloomiest of all ideas of God, man, and human nature. But if in Christ's name any labor to exorcise the evil spirit of guilt is done, let us not 'forbid them' simply because they follow not us; rather, let us rejoice in every way in which Christ is preached.

The Christian Examiner. March. 1843. Boston: James Munroe & Co. Bi-monthly; $4 per year. Providence: B. Cranston & Co.

The Christian Examiner is one of the ablest Reviews in the country. We value it highly, and would not, for a large price, part with it. We do not fancy, however, the new arrangement by which a portion of the pages is given to poetical contributions. The issue for March, presents two exceedingly valuable articles—'Slavery,' and 'The Early Literary History of Christianity,' by Revs. A. P. Peabody and G. E. Ellis. The article on slavery is an earnest and powerful production. It dissects the abominable foolishness of a writer in the 'Southern Review,' who endeavors, not to apologize for the perpetuation of the 'patriarchal institution,' but to legitimize it as a divine ordination, against which we should not and against which we cannot virtuously contend! He maintains that the Canaanites were doomed perpetually to be a servile race—hewers of wood and drawers of water; the modern Africans, he tells us, are the descendants of the Canaanites and heirs of the curse; and to this it is added, that the Creator has constituted them, body and soul, to be such in support of which opinion, the anatomist and psychologist are appealed to. The argument is briefly thus:—Noah's curse on Ham was prophetic and perpetual; the present negro races are identically the same as the Canaanites; the negro is, from necessity, more under the influence of his instincts, appetites, and animality, and less under the influence of his reflective faculties, than other races of men; the negro's eye has an anatomical contrivance, by which a membranous wing covers a considerable portion of the globe of the eye, when he is exposed, as he must be to the hot sun; in the negro's nature is provided a principle of protection against the exactions of a hard master, by making it impossible to force from him more than a moderate amount of service!—and next we are assured that the slaves are entirely contented with their condition and have no desire for freedom. The review of this presumptuous and impious article, is one of the most earnest and right down sensible articles on the subject of Southern Slavery we have ever read. How different as a specimen of reasoning and argument from the article in the same No. on the 'Destruction of the World by Fire!'

The Christian World: a monthly publication, for all denominations of Christians. T. H. Stockton, editor and proprietor. Philadelphia: Drew & Scam-mell. 1843. Vol. 3, No. 1. January. Pp. 24. $1 per year.

The Philadelphia 'Christian World,' in the quarto form, was one of the very best specimens of typography in the country, and was conducted with ability and true dignity. The present issue is in book form, much better for binding, and as beautiful an imprint as the other size. The present No. is embellished with an elegant mezzotint engraving, 'The Nativity.' It is the first of 'Serial Illustrations of the History of Christ.' The 'World' is a valuable work for reference, as it embraces a wide range of topics, and its literary character is of a high order.

The Health Journal, and Independent Magazine, February, 1843. Vol. 1, No. 1. 8vo. Pp. 32. Monthly: $2 per year. Boston: S. A. Whitmarsh.

We omitted to notice this magazine last month, but not because we had 'no opinion of it,' for we formed a very good one at first sight. It is edited, we understand, by Mrs. Gove, which to many will be a good recommendation. The pages of the present number are filled with very readable, and with some strong and thoughtful articles, on various subjects connected with physical, intellectual and moral reform; and the work is to be devoted to free thought on 'all questions and subjects that concern the great brotherhood of Man.' The typography is excellent.

THE SPIRIT OF SPRING.

BY HENRY BACON.

IN that beautiful tribute hymn to the God of nature—the 104th Psalm, the poet saith: 'Thou sendest forth thy Spirit, they are created; and thou renewest the face of the earth.' The season to which the sweet singer of Israel alluded, is now around us in its leafing and budding beauty. A creating spirit is abroad over the earth, renewing its face, as when the fountain of life in a human form is made to send healthy and vivifying influences to every portion of the frame, making the countenance beautiful with freshness and warmth, and causing the eye to glisten as an unbound streamlet that flows on singing in the sunshine. A great moral of the season is that which bids us recognize God as the Living Force, acting behind material veils, producing all that we behold—all that makes us rejoice that the spring-time is come. It is thus that we can realize the presence of God all around us, and adore him as the God of the rolling year. It is thus that we can be led to tender and beautiful thoughts of our Maker, and have awakened in our souls feelings 'too deep for tears.' It is thus that our moral sensibilities can be quickened, and we thereby be made able to read the lessons of the beauty of virtue and right industry, which the season presents.

The sacred writers give us abundant aid in this effort to make nature eloquent with God. They never stop at second causes. That which appears is as naught to that which is invisible; and the constant recognition of God as the Artist, gives enthusiasm to their contemplations of the beautiful pictures of the seasons, as the panorama of the year passes before them. And this caused them so frequently to apostrophize the animate and inanimate objects of the lower creation and call upon them with all their powers to praise God, as though they were endowed with intellectual and moral faculties. But from these apostrophies we are not to draw the influence that the sacred writers—the Hebrew bards, regarded these objects as thus endowed. No; the living thoughts of the poet went forth and gave the life of a rational soul to mountain and valley, hill, river and stream, beast, bird and insect, sun, moon and stars. As the rapt bards gazed on these portions of the material world, they found so much to admire, so many wonderful revelations of the ruling Deity, so many beautiful harmonies and adaptations, that, for the time, they felt that each had a soul like their own, and that unitedly they should praise the Creator. Thus mind gave mind to materiality and clothed nature with the attributes of spirit—as we do when exercised by great gladness, we walk forth amid the pleasantness of a bright spring-day, and speak of the earth as smiling and all nature as rejoicing. We can then bow down and easily fancy that we hear the breathing of the growing grass, and the beating of the heart of the unfolding bud; to speak then of 'the voices of spring,' is not to us mere poetry. There are voices—voices of music, coming to the spirit's ear, as if the angels were floating invisibly around and breathing the melodies of heaven in the forest, by the stream, and in the garden. There are voices—voices of those who once roamed with us amid the witching beauties of the rural walks, and discoursed of what their eyes beheld and their hearts felt, but who now have passed away.

'And there comes a shadow o'er us now,
For we've strown the dust on the sunny brow!
We have given the lovely to earth's embrace,
She hath taken the fairest of beauty's race;
With their laughing eyes and their festal crown,
They are gone from among us in silence down.'

But there are other voices—voices that speak of the Power that brings life out of death, that gives such a body as it pleases him to give to the surviving spirit; that renews the face of the earth, as an emblem of the freshness and beauty that gladden the soul in the spirit land. There are voices which remove the shadow from our brow—voices that come from the freed stream as it bounds from the mountain top or the sparry cave, rushing towards the mighty main to mingle with the waters that have gone before, as we are tending to eternity and to union with the departed. And as we listen to the faint sounds of that far off main, they seem to be the pleasant voices of the absent speaking from eternity, bidding us press on with unwavering hope, doing good as does the stream while it rushes on to the ocean.

Yes, that stream, causing verdure to mark its passage, teaches us the first lessons of Spring—freedom and industry—the beauty of active virtue and social goodness.

It speaks, I remarked, of Freedom; and by this I allude to thousands long pent up in their homes and denied by the severities of the past season from enjoying the free air. I allude also to birds and insects—to innumerable creatures delivered from bonds that bound. O there is much to waken grateful feeling as we now are permitted to walk forth and greet childhood sporting in the open air, playing with the sunbeams as with golden ribbands, and leaping and dancing in their excess of joy! And then too we meet old age leaning cheerfully on the strong staff, drinking in relief from much weariness, and rejoicing that once more they are permitted to behold the green earth, and bare their head to the grateful breeze, letting the wind sport with the silver locks that flash back the sunlight. And then, too, how pleasant it is to behold the invalid coming out from the dull chamber and sitting in the porch of the dwelling, wherefrom she can feast her eye on the renewing of nature's face, and be made glad as she meditates on the goodness of that power which thus can create anew. How rich are her thoughts as she looks abroad into the garden and field, or gazes on the lovely flowers that have been placed in her hands! How exquisite is the enjoyment of the relatives that gather around, placing on her brow the green and fragrant wreath, or directing her attention to the thrilling note of a bird, to the sport of the brooklet into which they have thrown a rock to form a mimic cascade, as the waters dash over it! Farther on, we behold more reasons for social grateful feeling, as we see the raised window of the room where the sick has long languished. Too feeble to reach the portals of the house, she is able to have the casement open and enjoy the sweet breath of morning as it steals over her with a reviving power. She can look out on the returning beauty of the earth, grateful for that privilege, and rejoicing in the cheerfulness of the many rural sounds that reach her ear. And then too the poor—the poor who have suffered much while they were forced to cling close to the small fire, the keen wind finding many a passage to them, as though sporting with the slight defences which they were able to procure. How often has the little child been kept in the covering of the humble night couch, till the sun rose to its noonday height and sent his grateful beams to gladden the cottage room! But now, the little innocents can rush forth early as their instincts prompt them, and find health, as well as joy, in the open air. I bless God for the spring-time as I think of the joy it gives to the poor, and I find deep sources of heartfelt gladness as I think of the freedom granted to multitudes by the goings forth of the Spirit that renews the face of the earth.

Beautiful are the sympathies thus awakened by Spring. They are the patrons of philanthropy and benevolence, and they prompt to deeds of gentleness and patient love. Happy is he in whose heart they reign with power, for his course will be like the stream that is our teacher—glad and fruitful.

This fruitfulness speaks of the second lesson of Spring—Industry. God's creating spirit is indeed abroad, and his power is indeed renewing the face of the earth; but this is not that man may be idle and dwell in luxurious slothfulness. No, but rather that he may be encouraged to labor—to imitate nature's industry—to work together with God, who giveth seed to the sower that bread may be given to the eater. He that 'goeth forth, weeping, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.' And why will he doubtless come again rejoicing, bearing the rewards of his labor? Because he has the right anxiety to sow and nourish aright the seed, in accordance with the established and unvarying laws of vegetable growth. And in this he is a pattern for all who labor in productive industry. They must study the laws of labor which cannot be set aside; and therefore in every relation in active life it is true, that as a man soweth, so shall he reap. Spring is beautiful as the result of the action of the laws of vegetable life as God ordained their operation, and beautiful are the effects of industry when directed by correct principles. Thus Spring not only calls us to the prompt and energetic exercise of our productive powers, but teaches us to control their operation by the dictates of honesty, integrity and prudence. Without obedience to these, industry has no beauty—the heart finds no happiness in the retrospect of life, and self-condemnation will often deprive the soul of power to enjoy what has thus been gained. It is indeed true that 'godliness is profitable unto all things;' and honesty is not to be recommended simply because it is the 'best policy,' but because of a higher consideration—it is God's law of right, and the noblest law of honor. Spring's honesty is Autumn's richness.

Another lesson of the teaching stream giving voice to the spring-time, tells of the beautiful effects of active and christian virtue in renewing the spring-time of the soul. Similar language to that which the Psalmist applies to Spring, is many times employed, both in the Old and New Testaments, to describe the effects of the operations of gospel faith. Beautiful is the language of prophecy: 'The Lord will comfort Zion; he will comfort all her waste places; and he will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord; joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving, and the voice of melody.' Again; after allusion was made to the mission of the snow and rain to prepare the earth for bringing forth and budding, to give seed to the sower and bread to the eater, the declaration is added that God's word shall in like manner accomplish the end for which it was sent, and then the effects are set forth, 'For ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace; the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the fields shall clap their hands. Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle-tree; and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off.' Again we read an even more direct and perfect similitude drawn from the season we are contemplating;—'For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord God will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all nations.'

How eloquent then should this season be in setting forth the power of the Gospel to produce a spring-time of the soul, and that the effects of the Gospel will ever be joyous and beautiful. When the garden causeth the things sown in it to spring forth, the reign of freshness and beauty commences; that which was late so unattractive, now begins to assume many charms, and the eye is no sooner directed thither than it glows with delight. The seeds prove their vitality—their affinity to the soil in which they were sown; and as the plant or slender stem of the flower rises, and the leafing process commences, a discovery is soon made of the character of the seed sown, and we delight to pronounce the names of the unfolding favorites, dear to the heart from tender associations. Even so is it with the seed of christian truth—of immortal vitality—when sown truly in the heart. Where there was a desert before, an Eden commences to bloom. The christian graces, one after another, each in her time and place, spring forth and bud and unfold their moral beauty and send out their sweetness to make the air balmy. Voices of joy are heard—for there must be spiritual melodies in the spring-time of the soul. And these representations of the effects of the growth of grace in the soul, effectually, it would seem, set aside the too common idea of dullness and gloom being the effects of religion's sovereignty within. We may plant a garden with seed that will produce none but dark and unfragrant flowers; but when we do so, we can expect no other result. So if we choose not right spiritual seed, we may have instead of an Eden, nothing but a drear array, as of a mourning assembly where Hope is not.

Yet it is a truth, that the Scripture references are all like those we have quoted, and always imply the existence of great joy and exquisite beauty in all spiritual gardens which are worthy of being called 'the gardens of the Lord.' Where gloom abides and no sweet singing birds will come, the wrong seed have been planted, or thorns have been permitted to choke good seed.

But has the true spring-time of the soul ever come to each of us? This is the great question, O my soul!

Has the good seed of the kingdom been sown in our hearts? Is it springing up? and if so, what increase does it promise? It may be that some are ready to inquire, How shall we know whether the reality has come to us? The answer is a plain one. How do we know when spring-time, as a yearly season, has come? We know it by the milder air and softer sunshine—by the freshness which is spreading itself over the earth, and the delicate flower peeping forth amid the yet frozen grass, the herald of the speedy coming of the beautiful children of May; and we know it by the labor required in the garden to pluck the ambitious weeds and guard the tender blade that betokens the growth of a flower or plant. By the same tokens we know when the soul's spring-time has come. If we breathe milder and speak more kindly—if a new life spreads itself over the spiritual being, and a freshness is given to religious things long unknown; if all the winter of the soul is broken up; if here and there, in the mental garden, seeds of truth are germinating, desirable plants and flowers are springing, and a need is felt of weeding, and of bestowing careful attention to what is permitted to take root,—then may we trust that the spiritual spring-time is come! and happy is he who, like a true husbandman or gardener, is faithful to the spring work; for beautiful will be the summer, and rich will be the autumn of life in immortal fruitfulness. 'This is the commandment, that ye bring forth much fruit.' Remember this—It is the Master's word—and be true to the work required; then will the discovery be made, of how true it is that life assumes new and happier aspects as we obey the laws of our higher nature; and of the spiritual garden, we shall find cause to say as the poet has said of another:

'Yes, in the poor man's garden grow
Far more than herbs and flowers;
Kind thoughts, contentment, peace of mind,
And joy for weary hours.'

Another lesson of the spring-time is that which speaks of our dependance upon God, who alone can give the early and latter rain. Without him, nothing lives. His power and wisdom are seen in every unfolding bud, in the delicate blossom, in the springing grass, in the foliage of the trees, in the luxuriance of the vine, and in every flower that lifts its head to smile and breathe out sweetness on the morning air. The birds as they cut through the blue air, or sing the song of love; the insects as they sport in the sunbeam, or sail on the stream; the rain as it descends, the dew as it falls, the wind as it blows,—all speak of God; and to him who will reverently listen, there will come voices as from the lowest valley, over plain and mount, and from shady wood, dense forest, and loftiest height, offering praise to God. We do not need to have priests go out on the high hill, as the Moslem priests ascend the towers, to cry—'God reigneth! Nature's stillness is more eloquent than any human voice. We know it when we are startled in our solitary meditations by a human voice. It leaves us to ourselves—to the undistracted exercise of all our rational powers, that we may find in our own hearts testimony to the highest truth—God reigns and man is dependant.

We may turn over the moist soil; we may prepare it with all possible diligence for the seed to be sown; and in the furrows we may drop the golden grains. There our power ends. We cannot bring the warmth from the sun, or the rain from the clouds. It comes as God wills; and we shall labor to the best success, inwardly and outwardly, as we reverently heed the lessons of our dependance and say with the Psalmist; 'Thou visitest the earth, and waterest it; thou greatly enrichest it with the river of God, which is full of water; thou preparest them corn, when thou hast so provided for it. Thou waterest the ridges thereof abundantly; thou settlest the furrows thereof, thou makest it soft with showers; thou blessest the springing thereof; thou crownest the year with thy goodness.' These are truths not only for the husbandman and dweller in the country; but for the inhabitant of the city, that he may honor aright the tiller of the soil and confess the medium by which God confers the essentials of life; and that he may also devoutly respect the laws of integrity in all the business of trade and commerce, in order that his harvest may be honorable to himself and to God.

In ending our communion with the spirit of Spring, let the season speak to us of cheerfulness, and let us drink in the inspiration of a happier life. Let us commune with the beauties of the opening season as with the hand-writing of a friend, and cultivate the pure feelings that may be awakened within us thereby.

Let the young especially receive wise lessons from the spring-time. It has sympathy with them. It is full of vivacity and joy. It inspires gladness in the soul. But it also teaches care and prudence, by the beauty that is seen in the garden where these virtues have been duly exercised, and by the want of beauty where they have been neglected. 'I went,' says the wise man, 'by the field of the slothful, and by the vineyard of the man void of understanding; and lo, it was all grown over with thorns, and nettles had covered the face thereof, and the stone wall thereof was broken down. Then I saw, and considered it well; I looked upon it and received instruction. He becometh poor that dealeth with a slack hand; but the hand of the diligent maketh rich.'

May the memories of the spring-time be sanctified to us. If when we go out to inhale the spirit of the season, we miss some of the beloved who were wont with us to say 'How Beautiful!' let our thoughts rise till we see the vision of the Redeemed, walking by glad streams, in white robes, with the green palm branch of victory over death and the grave.

JESUS OF NAZARETH.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

The stars were in the sky,
Holy and beautiful, as pearls of light,
That gem the crystal battlements on high,
With radiance purely bright;
And shadows deep, were on Judea's vales,
And silence brooded o'er her verdant dales.

The Temple gates were closed;
And 'round the hallowed shrine where fervent prayer
Was daily offered, Israel's priests reposed,
Safe in His watchful care
Who cleft the dark waves of the rolling sea,
And led his chosen forth from bondage free.

Amid the olive boughs
The night breeze stray'd with softly murmuring sound, wooing the wearied watchers to repose
In love and trust profound;
Resting the burden of their cares on Him
Who dwells between the glorious Cherubim.

O'er all the shadowy plain
The breezes bore no echo, save the song
Of purling rills, as the lone night-bird's strain,
Whose music thrill'd along
The vine-clad terraces, and shady bowers;
Now serene and chill, 'neath Autumn's drenching showers.

On storied Galilee
Thick brooding darkness rested like a pall;
The watchful Shepherds waited for the day,
And mourn'd their nation's thrall;
Communing sadly through that weary night,
Of promised Shiloh's long expected light.

Hark! on the midnight air
The thrilling cadences of minstrelsy;
Soft as Eolian music heard afar,
Or ocean-melody;
When gentle gales sing in the pearly shells,
And nereids weave their soul entrancing spells.

Near, and more near it rings,
And now the vast cerulean brightly glows;
The air is radiant with ten thousand wings,
And pure as northern snows
Those flowing robes that float adown the sky;
Whose radiance is too pure for mortal eye.

'Fear not,' the angel said,
'For unto you a Savior Christ is born;
Low in a manger rests his princely head,
Yet hallowed is the dawn
Of this blest morn, when God his love reveals;
And with such glorious boon the covenant seals.

Go ye to Bethlehem,
And worship him the matchless King of kings;
His brow is crown'd with mercy's diadem
And healing's in his wings.
The lyre notes through the empyrean rang,
And all the shining throng together sang.

'Glory to God on high.'

This was the burden of their song, and then
Pealed the loud anthem through the sapphire sky ;

'Good will henceforth to men.

The everlasting King descends to reign,
The Prince of glory comes to dwell with man.'

Came he with spear and shield ?
With glittering steel, and trumpets martial clang ?
With waving banners, gleaming o'er a field
Where the wild war-cry rang ?
With brazen armor, stain'd in human gore ?
And victory, plum'd above the battle's roar ?

Ah no, let tear drops flow,
Let the soul melt in gratitude and love ;
He came to gild the wastes of human woe
With radiance from above.
To shed the glory of the life divine
O'er the dark rayless midnight of the mind.

On Olivet's fair brow
Behold him teaching 'mid the wondering throng ;
List, from his lips what gracious accents flow,
Sweeter than notes of song,
When Judea's daughters swept the sounding wires ;
And on her mountains rang the prophet lyres.

'Blest are the pure in soul ;
For they shall walk in robes of stainless white ;
They shall be led where living waters roll,
And visions ever bright,
Shall cheer their pathway through this vale of tears,
With a sweet foretaste of the eternal years.'

'Blest are the mourning ones
Who thirst for the clear streams of righteousness ;
They shall be filled, and with the shining ones
Repose in bowers of peace.
They shall not roam 'mid gloomy shades of night,
For truth shall be their soul's unfading light.'

When shadows dim thy sky,
And threatening tempests frown above thy way,
When one by one thine earthly comforts die,
And cherished hopes decay ;
Then rise, and gird faith's heavenly armor on,
And tread the path mark'd by the Sinless One.

He is the living Light,
Whose splendors dim the glowing noontide ray ;
His hand hath rent the gloomy veil of night ;
And heaven's immortal day
Is beaming o'er the portals of the tomb,
And crowning Death's pale brow with fadeless bloom.

When we have burst the bars
That chain us sadly to this weary earth ;
When we shall tread the pathway of the stars,
In the bright spirit-birth ;
Then shall we understand the thrilling song
That o'er the plains of Bethlehem peal'd along.

'Glory to God most High ;'
From myriad living harps shall ring that strain :
The ransom'd of the Lord no more shall die,

Or suffer grief, or pain ;
But songs and everlasting joy shall crown
The unnumber'd millions round the emerald throne.

Soon shall our spirits stand
Within the golden courts, and tune the lyre
To swell the anthems of the white robed band,
That walk the sea of fire ;
Whose crystal waves resound the deep-toned lays,
'Till heaven's eternal arches ring with praise.

Malone, N. Y.

DUNN BROWNE, ESQ.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

'WELL, Mary, here we are by ourselves, in our retired and pleasant room, with a cheerful fire and nothing to disturb us ; and now what shall we do to make the time pass pleasantly ?'

'With me it could not pass otherwise than pleasantly while I am in your society, for it is happiness enough to be where you are, to hear your voice and look upon your soul-beaming face. There is nothing for me, like the charm of a quiet room which contains a treasured friend, with whom we can converse, or indulge in musing, as we feel in a social or silent mood ; for we can never be truly at ease where conversation must be constantly kept up, because a pause would be embarrassing. But you ask what we shall do ? and I answer read, of course, for your library contains many useful and amusing works, which we have not yet allowed ourselves the pleasure of perusing together. And the next question is, what shall we read ? poetry or prose, philosophy or fiction ?'

'Why I vote for fiction ; but you need not smile, as much as to say, "I knew you would," for I do sometimes read other books than novels, though you look so credulous ; but what say you to "The Pathfinder ?"'

'O, do not ask me to read that to-night.'

'Why ? have you any especial dislike for that book in particular ?'

'No, I never saw it ; but have read so many similar to it, by the same author, I think I know just how it begins and ends. Can you not think of some other book that would suit you as well ?'

'Not now ; I am quite set upon that ; that or none ; but since we cannot agree, let us postpone reading, and have "a talk," as the Indians say.'

'Well, so say I ; but what shall we talk about ? Is there any subject upon which your mind is particularly exercised at present ?'

'Oh no ! but what if you should tell a story ?'

'Why, you do not think I am an Improvisatrice, or an eastern tale teller, do you ? Would you have a true or false narrative ? and what should it be about ?'

'It would be of no great consequence whether it was fact or fiction ; but have you no amusing adventure of your own to relate ? Has nothing befallen you since you came to the Quaker city which might "point a moral or adorn a tale?" and have you met no original characters who would do for heroes or heroines of romance ?

'Perhaps I have ; but do you think they would like to be brought "before the people" in the pages of a public print ? As for my own adventures, they have never been at all Quixotic, romantic, or sentimental ; for, as you very well know, I am a right down, matter of fact damsel. There is one thing which is rather annoying, especially to a nervous person, and I wonder if you have ever thought of it : it is to have people expecting you will write about every thing that comes under your observation which is a little out of the course of common, every day events ; to hear them say this or that occurrence would be "a fine subject for your pen ;" "you must write some lines on that event," or "this adventure would be a good theme for a story." I know it is perfectly natural to make such remarks, though I cannot refrain from smiling when I hear them ; but this is a digression, not made to find fault with your request about the story ; so take up your "knitting work," and put the green shade over the lamp, that you may not look into my eyes if you suspect me of not telling "an ower true tale."

'As I was one day taking a solitary walk through the straight streets of this rectangular city, and moralizing to myself on the loneliness one sometimes feels amid a passing crowd, my attention was attracted by an ancient looking mansion, which stands several feet farther back from the pavement than most of the houses in Fourth Street. It is built of brick, black and red alternately ; on the front, between the lower and upper stories, are white marble slabs with reclining figures sculptured thereon ; small, slightly projecting blocks of the same, form an arch around the door way ; and a wide portico, or piazza, extends across the front, with broad marble steps descending to the court-yard, which is paved and enclosed by an iron railing. It bears no comparison with the proud dwellings of the present day ; but there is something about it which made me think it might in time past have been the residence of a wealthy citizen. An aged, wrinkled woman ; a dealer in pies and cakes, and such delectables ; had her station and her little table near to the gateway. My fancy was wide awake, and I imagined that ancient dame might know something of the history of a dwelling before which she seemed to be a fixture ; and if there was aught of the marvellous, any legend or romance of the past connected with it, who so fit to know and relate it, as the wierd woman, with sharp gray eye and silver locks, who sat without the gate. I stopped before the table to select something from her little store, and having won her good will, and suited my Yankee taste, by "buying out" her whole stock of molasses candy, I inquired how long she had kept her stand in that particular place. "Many years, marm," she answered, "many years." "Then," said I, "you must have seen many changes ; yonder house has come to be a familiar object, and often must its inhabitants have gone in and out before you."

'Ah ! lady, you are right. I have seen the bride come hither in her gay attire, and the mother borne away with her face shrouded for the grave. I have seen the dancing child grow up to womanhood ; have known her trials, her sorrow and her joy, and have bid her farewell on this very spot when she went forth to return here no more.'

'Who was she ?' I eagerly asked, 'good woman, will you not tell me her name and story ?' She seemed ready to gratify my curiosity, and regardless of appearances, I seated myself on a stone which, fortunately for my comfort, as I was somewhat weary, happened to lie upon the pavement by her side ; and this is the tale she told me ; of course I do not confine myself entirely to her own words in repeating it, though she spoke correctly and with the eloquence of feeling.'

'The house before us was purchased many years ago by Monsieur Linant, a French gentleman, who had made quite a fortune by trading here and in foreign places, to which he often made long voyages, till he seemed to be a citizen of the world, with no idea of making any particular place a permanent home. But finally, after having nearly passed the meridian of life, he came here once more with a beautiful young Spanish lady, who, as woman sometimes does, had given her heart to one many years her senior, and become his willing wife. This was the bower to which he brought his cherished dove, and it was then truly a luxurious dwelling. The muslins of India, and the silks of Persia, draped the windows, and soft, rich carpets from Turkish looms, covered the floors. Books, musical instruments and pictures, were collected together, to amuse the idolized young wife ; who, secluded from the world, like a bird in some leafy bower, seemed to have no wish but to lavish her love and her charms upon one alone. Monsieur Linant was somewhat avaricious and fond of hoarding his wealth ; but his strong box, like his heart, was ever open to his charming wife, and her every wish was abundantly gratified. They were such a couple as we sometimes see, who, had we known them apart, we should have thought were entirely unfitted to tread their path together ; but who, when united, seemed to have been made for each other. He was a man of no more than ordinary intelligence, and of reserved and cold exterior, which is not common with those of his country. He had never sang lays in lady's bower, or dipped his pencil in the hues of light, or wove sweet words in story to charm the ear. His life had been spent in the pursuit of wealth, and his intercourse was mostly with the calculating and the cold. Gray hairs were sprinkled among his dark brown locks, and lines of care were legible upon his brow; but he was blest with fervent affections and a gentle nature, and was the chosen of a young, high souled and loving woman: one who had spent her days among the beauties of nature, and the bright creations of art; whose affections had been lavished upon poetry, and birds, and flowers; till her heart was made a shrine for the image of him who became her husband; who took the place of every other idol, and was more than all the world beside. Happy they were together through the whole of their short wedded life, and Heaven gave them one fair daughter to crown their cup of bliss. I seem to see her now frolicking among the flowers; for this paved court-yard was then a perfect bower of blossoms, shrubs and trees surrounded the mansion, and the pillars of the portico were wreathed all over with flowering vines.

Time passed on, and nothing had yet occurred to mar their deep felt, quiet joy. The young Inez, the fairy child, had reached her tenth summer, and their hearts were full of fond anticipations of the blissful lot which the future should bring for their darling. But a sudden blight came upon the mother; her cheek grew pale, and her dark eye faded; and after a few months of languishing, the bier brought forth all that remained of that lovely and loving woman. O, it was sad to see the stricken husband. He seemed to grow older in a few days than during the ten years before; his hair became white, and fell away from his forehead; his head was bowed and his step heavy and slow; and the young girl wept and mourned, and would not be comforted. The windows of the house were darkened, and the garden was neglected, and it seemed that the cloud of sorrow which overshadowed the place would never pass away; but time softens the deepest grief, and the bereaved husband again went forth to mingle with his fellows, and the sad daughter found solace among her birds and flowers.

Years flew away, and the sweet Inez was seen by the windows, on the portico, and in the garden, with a graceful youth ever by her side. It was her cousin Henri, her father's nephew, who, when left an orphan in France, had been offered a home by his uncle. He did not wish to be an idle pensioner on that uncle's bounty, but was preparing himself for some situation in a foreign city, which M. Linant promised to procure him. In the mean time he was cherishing a passion for Inez which was to be the bane or blessing of his after years, and she too allowed her heart to twine itself around the handsome Henri. I need not detail the progress of such an attachment; but when their affections were unalterably fixed, the time came for Henri's departure. M. Linant had been unconscious of their growing attachment, and when the truth was told him, he refused to sanction it, and bade Henri depart without a hope of ever being received as a candidate for the hand of his cousin. They parted in sorrow, with an interdict denying them any future correspondence, and each felt that darkening of the soul which follows the vanishing of youthful hopes.

It might seem that the father was cruel in thus dooming two young hearts to such bitter disappointment; but Inez was his all; she was young, and could soon forget her first fancy, and she should not plight her troth to her penniless cousin. He did not wish her to marry at all; but if she did, he must give her to one who would not allow 'the winds of heaven to visit her too roughly;' who would shower the luxuries which wealth procures around her; in short, a husband of his own, instead of her, choosing.

Inez did not 'pine away,' or grow fretful under the influence of this affliction; her laugh might have been less joyous, and perhaps she shed some tears in secret, but no trace of them could ever be discovered. She united a considerable degree of French vivacity with a share of Spanish reserve and pride, and though her thoughts never wandered from her cousin and his unkind banishment, she devoted herself more than ever to her father, and went in and out before him with a sunny brow, till he laid 'the flattering unction to his soul,' that he had acted wisely, and that Henri was forgotten. But a new competitor for the favor of Inez appeared, who needs to be introduced to notice.

Dunn Browne, Esq. had attained his majority, and come into the possession of a rich inheritance. He was vain and shallow minded, and had little beside his wealth, and personal appearance which was prepossessing, to recommend him; but he imagined that these would be a passport to the favor of all. He set up an elegant establishment; dashed about with a handsome equipage and fine horses; wore his hair in ringlets, and decorated himself much as do the dandies of the present day. He added an e to his name, to distinguish himself from the common herd of Brown's, and never wrote it without tacking on the title of Esquire; and the card of 'Dunn Browne, Esq.' was welcomed with delight by many a fashionable lady as the voucher of a call from that distinguished individual. He spent his time in idleness, on the pursuit of pleasure; to be sure his tables were covered with fine books, but he never read them, and his walls were hung with costly paintings, but he looked upon them only as necessary articles of ornament; they could not cause his eye to light up with admiration and pleasure; they never touched his heart, and he did not know a Salvator Rosa from a Claude Lorrain. As he had nothing else to do, he saw fit to fall desperately in love with the fair Inez Linant. He was continually annoying her with his attentions; his horses stood at her door daily, waiting for the honor of giving her an airing, and when she excused herself from receiving him, she found a card, with 'Dunn Browne, Esq.' staring at her in large letters, from some conspicuous situation.

Her father encouraged his visits, and she could not always avoid him, or refuse his attendance when she appeared in public; and sometimes her natural gaiety and fondness for amusement, got the better of her discretion; and she would forget her coldness, and allow herself to be so friendly and agreeable, that the sanguine gentleman thought he had but to say the word and be accepted. Accordingly, having obtained the consent of M. Linant, he declared his passion to Inez; laid himself and his wealth at her feet, and was rejected on the spot, without reserve or hesitation. It so happened that while writhing under the mortification of this event, he received a call from the lawyer who was settling the claims, for and against, the estate he had inherited. Among the houses and lands mentioned in the will as bequeathed him by his father, who had died leaving him an orphan in boyhood, were the mansion and grounds occupied by Monsieur Linant. His guardian, not doubting the honor of M. Linant, had taken his word as proof that the place had been duly purchased, without seeing the deed, or having the fact legally established; but our rejected heir, vexed with the daughter, determined to accuse the father of holding property not his own. M. Linant who had ever been exact and honorable in all his transactions, felt wronged and insulted by such a charge. He explained how he had purchased the estate, and received a deed drawn up according to the form observed in such cases; and how the father of the young man had died suddenly, soon after, which accounted for the will, which had doubtless been made before, remaining unaltered. He would then have brought the deed to be examined, but it was no where to be found, and he was threatened with a lawsuit if the paper was not produced, or the property given up.

They sought the lost deed in vain, till they were hopeless of its ever being found; and Inez was censured by her father for refusing a man whose wealth would make her happy, and who now would endeavor to deprive them of their home. M. Linant was naturally avaricious; but his indulgence towards his wife had been unbounded; and having pursued no business, and added nothing to his possessions, for many years, if the valuable estate on which he resided should be taken from him, he would be left no means of procuring another to compare with it. He explained the whole matter to Inez, and besought her to save her father and herself from poverty and disgrace, by considering more favorably the suit of her discarded lover. Inez was not prepared for such a dilemma; she might endeavor to make a friend of her suitor, but she would not, she could not be his wife.

Dunn Browne was not wholly ignorant of the ways of womankind. He knew the most cruel of the sex sometimes relented; that perseverance would overcome many obstacles; and finally he thought the lady must have been joking when she refused such a desirable match as he considered himself; and so he returned with new hope to the siege of her woman's heart.

'No wonder he would not willingly give up the wish of winning Inez Linant; for O, she was a lovely and a fairy creature; not much larger than yourself, and you are an uncommon small lady:' and here the old woman paused in her story and surveyed me from head to foot; then being apparently satisfied with having made so true a remark, she thus continued:—'I will not attempt to describe her; but think of the most beautiful being you ever saw and call her Inez; neither will I dwell long on the trial she underwent in endeavoring to obey the commands of her father; who finally insisted upon her giving her hand to a man she regarded with abhorrence. The time was even mentioned when the sacrifice was to be made, and Inez could do nothing but weep and fold her hands in despair; but a few days before the dreaded event a change appeared to have come over her spirit; she seemed determined to resign herself cheerfully to the worst, and went about the house with her accustomed alacrity busying herself with preparations for her bridal. The guests were invited, and the rooms swept and garnished. I thought there was mischief in her eye; but she kept her own council, and all wondered at her changing will: all but Dunn Browne, and he thought it was the most natural thing in the world that she should be pleased with the prospect of wedding a man like him.

The anxiously expected evening came, and every thing about the house was in bridal array. The guests were assembled; Inez, resplendently decked, came forth from her chamber; the bridegroom expectant, showering perfume and shining in curls, broadcloth and ruffles, led her before the holy man, and when he repeated with solemn air "if any can show reason why these two should not be united let him speak now or ever after hold his peace;" a manly voice was heard in response, saying "pause priest! she is mine!" and a noble looking youth stationed himself by her side. "Henri!" she exclaimed "O, save me!" and she put her hand in his with such an appealing and confiding glance he could scarce refrain from folding her to his heart.

Henri took M. Linant aside and explained all in a few words. He had returned three days before and sought an interview with Inez, when she explained to him the difficulties of her own and her father's situation. He had been fortunate in his business transactions; a maiden aunt had left him a fine estate in France, and furthermore the lost deed was safe in his possession. Inez had given him, years ago, a curious box that once belonged to her mother, and during his absence he had accidentally discovered in it a secret drawer containing the deed, which had probably been put there through mistake, and sundry other papers. He hoped, these fortunate circumstances considered, his uncle would not deem him entirely unworthy of his constant cousin. It was she who had contrived this little ruse of allowing the wedding to proceed till he should appear at the critical moment, that thus she might have an opportunity of being revenged on her troublesome lover; and now, with her father's consent, the holy man should say the words which would give him his own Inez.

M. Linant could hesitate no longer, he smiled his approbation, the ceremony went on, and one bridegroom made way for another. The knot was tied, Inez wept and smiled, Henri looked radiant with joy and triumph, the guests were amazed, and Dunn Browne, Esq. was most completely, and to all intents and purposes, done brown.

There is nothing more to relate, except that Monsieur Linant soon after sold his residence, and removed to France with his children. The house has since passed through the hands of several owners; time has not improved it, and you see what it now is, when its palmy days have departed.

'And so endeth the story which the pie-woman told me.'

'Well Mary, is it all true?'

'True, why I thought you was fond of fiction, and I did not promise to tell the truth, did I?'

'No, I believe not; but is the house really there, in Fourth Street?'

'Certainly it is.'

'Just as you have described it?'

'As nearly as I can recollect.'

'And the old woman, is she there too?'

'She is not far off.'

'And did she tell you this story?'

'Why how incredulous you are; I have said she did; but if you doubt my word you can go and ask her.'

THE MINSTREL BRIDE.

BY CHARLOTTE.

THE accompanying stanzas were suggested by an engraving, entitled the 'Bridal Wreath'—representing two females—one wreathing the hair of the other with orange blossoms. The face of the bride, though beautiful, wore an expression of intense melancholy, which attracted my attention, and suggested a little romance which I have woven into verse as follows:

TWINE not amid my tresses now

Those orange blossoms fair,

Their beauty ill befits this brow,

They'll fade and wither there.

And take these glistening pearls away,

Their purity would shame

The unquiet breast whereon they lay,

That bartered peace for fame.

Those beautiful, pale orange flowers!

What dreams of olden time,

VOL. XI.

52

Of vanished joys, departed hours,
And my own sunny clime,
They bring before my aching eyes,
Until I yearn to be
Once more beneath thy sapphire skies,
Mine own fair Italy!

Those skies—they never look so blue,
In this far distant land—
And hearts are colder—friends are few
To press the stranger's hand.
I loathe this carved and gilded dome,
With gorgeous tap'stries hung!
O give me back my childhood's home,
Where first my lute I strung!

Why did I leave that vine-clad cot,
To gain a prouder name—
And bear a minstrel's chequered lot,
To win a minstrel's fame?
I deemed that was the highest bliss,
The triumph of my art!
I left my native land for this,
And broke a trusting heart!

My laurel wreath with blood is stained—
How great hath been its cost!
What is the glory I have gained,
Compared with all I've lost?—
Earth's proudest ones have sought my shrine,
And offered incense there—
But gladly would I all resign,
A quiet heart to bear!

Ye've twined the bridal orange wreath
Amid my raven hair—
Alas! the brow that smiles beneath,
Doth hide a weight of care!
Ye deem it strange, a 'blessed bride'
Should weep on such a day,—
And 'tis not well—but do not chide—
I'll wipe my tears away.

There! that's the last! one heart-wrung sigh,
To ancient memories given—
One burning tear to days gone by,
To ties forever riven!
And now lead on! the pang is o'er—
Let weal or wo betide,
No chance or change can ever more
Affect the Minstrel Bride.

CHRISTIAN SUBMISSION.

THE reasonableness of submission to the Divine will and dealings with us, appears very plain from the view the Scriptures give us of the Divine government. It is perfect; all its principles are right, just, and benevolent; all its operations harmonize with a wisdom that cannot err and a goodness that cannot be unkind; and identifies the glory of the Supreme with the happiness of man. The Scriptures do not permit us to doubt the benevolence of God's government, but write upon the very throne of his judgment his name—Love, as the Savior bade his disciples to pray that the Father's kingdom might come and His will be done. If his government is perfect, and we are his subjects, regarded with kindness, the reasonableness of submission is apparent, and as rational beings the duty is binding on us.

There is a necessity for this submission. It should not sound harshly when we are kindly told that we cannot throw off the government of the Divinity, nor exempt ourselves from the jurisdiction of his omniscience. This will not sound with severe tone if we remember the character of our Governor, though it tells us of the necessity of submission. He is the universal King, of unlimited dominion, and the order of worlds and all the harmony of mind depend on this necessity. The highest angel in the courts of the Holy One is thus connected, and we cannot conceive of any good unconnected with obedience to the Divine will. The Infinite Mind we cannot fathom, and our short-sightedness is sufficient of itself to teach us this necessity, and the intimate connection of peace of mind with this submission. Thus submission brings us in harmony with celestial order.

There are rich advantages in this submission, but they cannot be adequately described. The experience of every true heart can testify to the great advantages of christian submission, and how much more was desired in times of affliction or calamity than possessed. It is the parent of Patience, that amiable virtue—that strengthener of the weak heart—that energy to the desponding soul. It does much to lessen the weariness of sickness, to take away the corroding power of bereavement, and to lift the mind above the weighty depressions of misfortune. It teaches us to bow our minds in humility, to trust where we cannot see, and wait with fortitude for the time of relief and gladness. It enables us rightly to value the evanescent things of earth, and set our affections on the imperishable realities of heaven and eternity, regarding ourselves as pilgrims destined to a better country.

There are many and various teachers of this submission. The reasonableness, the necessity, and the advantages of this submission, are so many teachers of the duty, to enforce it on the mind and persuade the heart to cherish it in a very warm embrace. The circumstances of our being instruct us of this duty; for we are introduced into existence weak, dependant creatures, subject to the control of others; and even to the close of life we are subject to human laws and government. Every day teaches the folly of expecting to make our will supreme, our wishes the law of conduct, and our inclinations the arbiter of what others owe us; but it tells us how we should aim and persevere to mould the temper of our mind in accordance with the wisdom of heaven, that we may escape the evils of following the wisdom that is foolishness with God. Thus we see that the constitution and order of nature, the dictates of searching reason, and the events of life, concur with the solemn, yet affectionate, voice of revelation, to enjoin upon us submission to the Divine Will; showing us that while obedience is required by the Supreme and is honorable to him, it is the only source of mental quietude.

And the Scriptures give us much aid to enable us to cultivate this needed submission, especially in the view they present of the future life, so unlike and so superior to the speculations of philosophy. The gospel represents the raising of mankind from death to another life, as a mighty operation of the glorious power of God, a constitution of his infinite wisdom, and an effect of his paternal goodness; and deduces the primary evidences of our belief, not from the merits of men, but from the grace, or favor, of God, who in pursuance of the same wise and good purposes for which he created mankind, saves them from perishing at death, and raises them to another life. The Scriptures permit us also to believe, that as the goodness of God prompted him to bestow this existence, so in the other life his benevolence will abound. I know no vestige of a reason why any rational mind should regard the character of God's government as being changed after death has visited mortals, and that though through life he followed them with expressions of love and compassion, yet after the valley of death has been trodden, he will be their enemy. They who believe such inconsistencies are certainly advocates for a great change in the unchangeable Mind, which we regard as no less fatal to the peace of mankind, than dishonorable to God.

We are privileged to gain assistance in strengthening our faith from all that we see of God in the material world and in the wonderful powers of the human mind. What vast and astonishing displays of power and skill have been made in ages past to man! Centuries have rolled on, and the celestial company of worlds has marched in the appointed order, and the seasons in their revolutions still bring seed time and harvest. Why may we not believe the future has in store equal wonders; and if the Majesty of heaven has condescended to give us this existence with all its blessings, why may he not give us another, with other delights? What is too great or good to expect from the unlimited power, wisdom and goodness of our Benefactor? When we consider the power that commanded light into existence, formed and set in motion the heavenly bodies, and gave life to every living thing; that wisdom which mysteriously directs all the revolutions of the material system and connects the remotest parts of creation by invisible chains, and unites souls and bodies with unsearchable skill; that goodness which is the abounding source of all joy, and which made the earth and heavens contribute to the benefit of man;—when we consider these, what effects for the glory of God and man's good, may we not expect future ages and invisible worlds.

will reveal? What room is there to doubt the accomplishment of the fullness of the Restitution? What pretence can we have for doubting the parental providence of Jehovah? What reason is there for questioning our Maker's goodness when mysterious calamity overtakes us? Why should we not open our hearts to receive the comforts which the Father of mercies abundantly bestows? Why should we not be submissive?

Submission is not unmoved stoicism; it does not require that we never weep, for he who is our pattern wept. Nature will triumph in her own hour, and the full heart find relief in the gushing tears. Christianity does not forbid this indulgence; it is adapted to sensibility; it knows death must be considered in one view as our enemy, for he comes in and snaps asunder the chain of affection and removes away a link; he is unmoved by the lamentations of the mother, the bursting heart of the wife, the unutterable grief of the husband, or the melting sorrow of the child. No tie is too sacred to be touched by his withering hand; no supplications can avert the afflicting stroke; the wife may become a lonely widow, the home of the husband desolate, and the child an orphan in a cold world, but the work must be done—and the silver chord of life is broken. To-day, the lovely babe is borne home to God, and angels rejoice that another is added to the cherubim, while the mother weeps that her arms are empty, and the father mourns that his heart's pride has vanished; to-morrow, the hoary headed sire may be borne to the tomb, and the ministering spirits who watch over declining age, hail his entrance to the world of immortal youth, while there is sorrow and weeping in the earthly home that the good councillor and venerable father is no more there; and thus each day and every day, death is extending his conquests, and showing fearfully that he has all times to take his own, and no age is secure.

But there is a brighter part of death's picture. From how many evils are the departed removed, and from how much sorrow and suffering delivered. And consider also, how the Scriptures represent mortals as pilgrims and strangers in the earth, as away from home, afar from their best enjoyments, and that they tell us the issues of death are with that God who is good unto all and whose tender mercies are over all his works. Remember also, we are privileged to feel that as Jesus remembered his apostles after his resurrection, so the dear departed still remember us, and as he gave them evidences of his undiminished love for them, so, in due time, our friends will give us proofs of their unchanged affection. O glorious hour, how sweet to anticipate its approach! It makes us love to think of the dead; to think over what they were to us; each little tribute of their love to prize as a gem; to remember the happy hours we passed by their side, and all they done to add to our comfort; to feel that their spirits are hovering around us—that their eyes look upon us, and that they hear us when we breathe the love we still bear them.

'Some of the native Brazilians pay great veneration to a certain bird that sings mournfully in the night time. They say it is a messenger which their deceased friends and relations have sent, and that it brings them news of the other world.' The sweet poetess, Mrs. Hemans, has beautifully addressed this bird:—

'Thou art come from the spirits' land, thou bird!
Thou art come from the spirits' land!
Thro' the dark pine grove let thy voice be heard,
And tell of the shadowy band!

We know that the bowers are green and fair
In the light of that summer shore,
And we know that the friends we have lost, are there,
They are there—and they weep no more.

But tell us, thou bird of the solemn strain!
Can those who have loved forget?
We call—and they answer not again—
—Do they love—do they love us yet?

We call them far through the silent night,
And they speak not from cave or hill;
We know, thou bird, that their land is bright,
But say, do they love there still?

Echo gives the right answer—they love there still!
There shall we realize the most ardent hopes of the aspiring and affectionate heart; no sickness, no gloom, no discord, shall mar the bliss, but the bond of perfectness shall encircle all—

'—no wanderer lost,
A family in heaven.'

THE GIPSEY'S MAGIC WORD.

BY CHARLES O. P. ELLIS.

MARY ANN and Rhoda Guest were cousins. The former was tall, with deep blue eyes and flaxen hair. She might have been considered sylph-like by some critics. Her complexion readily reminded one of pearl, as there was but little color in her cheeks, yet the impression made upon the mind of the observer was rather that of delicacy than infirm health. Her teeth were even and white, and her smile, though pleasant, seldom awakened an answering smile upon the countenances of others, but rather inspired awe and admiration. Altogether, there was something ethereal and mysterious in the looks of Mary Ann—if not in her deportment. Rhoda, on the other hand, was a gay, lively, dark eyed girl, not a brunette, but with tolerably fair complexion, and rosy cheeks. She was about the middling height, and was thought pretty.

It was a sultry afternoon in summer when the two cousins had extended their walk farther than usual, and arrived at an old ruined tower, near the borders of a small but very deep lake. In America, it might have been termed a pond. This tower was the scene of several interesting legends, not unmingled with superstition. It appears not to have been generally known for what purpose this tower was built, as Rhoda said—'See how the weeds over-run the old stones, and the snake glides away through the interstices at our approach. This tower must be very ancient. Do you suppose that while it was in its glory, young ladies wandered about these precincts, as we do now. Must it not have seemed queer to them, to be dressed in those old fashioned garments. The woman of Samaria in Calmet's dictionary, is singularly attired; but surely her dress approaches more nearly to that of women's dresses in this age than some others that I have heard of.'

'The dresses worn of old were fashionable in the time of them, and could the people who lived in ancient times have foreseen what we should wear, they would have "counted it odd,"' answered Mary Ann.

'But you must acknowledge that our dresses are much more proper than'—

'They were last year,' interrupted Mary Ann. 'It is difficult to tell when our dresses are proper, or how many more times they will be altered before we get them right.'

Here she sauntered on, as if some sudden thought had struck her, and Rhoda knew her so well, that she did not undertake to interrupt her musings. She knelt down to gather a few wild flowers, while Mary Ann walked forward, sometimes slowly, and at other times moving with great velocity. In a few minutes, however, she returned to the spot where Rhoda had awaited her, and began to converse affably upon some ordinary subject.

'Pray tell me what you were thinking of, just now, when you ran off and left me alone, to amuse myself with these gray stones,' said Rhoda, with a bright and knowing smile.

'Thinking of,' said she, 'I do not know that I could be said to have been thinking; it is nothing, perhaps, that I could express intelligibly.'

'Ho! ho!' cried the other, laughing, 'you can't tell. Mysterious feelings about the heart, I suppose. Cousin Albert didn't bring home his gallant chum to no purpose. I saw you looking very earnestly at him at the breakfast-table, this morning. Pray what were you thinking of then—or can you not express it in intelligible language?'

'Very easily, coz; I was thinking whether there was any real difference between his nature and that of a king—whether royal blood was better than any other blood.'

'He had a noble air, and well he might,' returned Rhoda, 'for you must know that he is very nearly related to the family of Lord Albury.'

'Indeed!' cried Mary Ann, 'then I am troubled again. Are you sure that he has what is termed noble blood?'

'I am sure of it,' said the other, 'but don't despair on that account.'

'Pray how can I get out of my difficulty, then,' said Mary Ann.

'Now that you have made me your confidant,' said the other, 'I will tell you. You must know that, although Algernon Powers is related to the nobility, and may come in possession of a peerage, it will still be an empty title. Your gold would set it off to great advantage, and therefore—'

'But how does that enlighten me with respect to the question of human equality?'

'Certainly it does,' said the other mischievously, 'for your gold is an equivalent for his title.' Here Mary Ann became silent a moment, and then said, 'Circumstances produce inequality. One is better bred and educated than another, and among people of understanding, this gives the idea of superiority; while some have more wealth, and this is supposed by some to make up for the deficiency of good manners and intelligence. People do not so keenly feel the want of mental food, as they feel the want of physical aliment—therefore money generally takes precedence of talent and intelligence. Animal life is older than intellectual life, and the younger serves the elder. But where titles are concerned, in what consists the superiority? Is it not merely nominal?'

'The value of gold is merely nominal,' said the gay Rhoda. 'We might make money of lead, and term that the precious metal.'

'There is one objection to this—gold is the more scarce article of the two.'

'We do not esteem every thing that is scarce,' said Mary Ann. 'Yet in many cases we do so. An apple in the Indies is more highly esteemed than an orange. Here the case is different. This is easily explained on natural principles. Man loves novelty. We grow tired of food that we have been long accustomed to.'

'It is for that reason that I mean never to get married,' exclaimed Rhoda, briskly. 'Now, the beaux bend their backs whenever they speak to me; but if I were married, it would be too much trouble.'

Mary Ann took no notice of this remark, but continued—'Titles appear to me to be merely nominal, although in the first instance they may be won by superior courage and prowess. Now the question is, whether the children of a man who has won a title by what are termed "noble deeds," do not inherit some of their father's talent and heroism, and whether their education is not such as to qualify them for greatness.'

'That might be for a few generations,' said the other, 'but the stock must deteriorate in time.'

'What if the blood is kept pure,' said the other, 'and nobles intermarry only with nobles, and the education and breeding are always consonant with nobility of birth?"

"I should suppose," said Rhoda, "that then there would be something noble in all noblemen."

"I doubt it"—returned Mary Ann, "for nothing is more common than for a brave and magnanimous man to have a puerile and weak minded son. As a general thing, children resemble their parents, but there are so many exceptions that I place little faith in the nobleness of nobility. If noblemen had adopted all their children, and had never let them know that they were merely children by adoption, and had educated them as they now educate their eldest sons, our nobility would have been as noble as it is now."

"Still, cousin, you cannot pretend that all men are equal. Compare Algernon Powers with William Howard—both have received the same advantages, but how much more superior is"—

"Which?"

"Can you ask that question? Algernon will be acknowledged by every one to be the superior."

"He is superior in height," said Mary Ann.

"In bearing—in manner—in intelligence—in every thing," said Rhoda.

"William Howard has no title," said the other.

"No title to my esteem," said Rhoda, "when compared with Algernon."

"You speak warmly," said the other, "but I confess that Algernon is very polite to you, very complimentary."

"I am not so selfish," returned Rhoda, "but I heard him speak very highly of you."

"I will not ask you what he said, although you seem to desire I should do so," said the other. "So you may keep your secret. I am somewhat weary of fine speeches made under such circumstances. They are too much alike, and with most young men, are a matter of course. Gallantry appears to consist in a few set phrases learned by rote, and certain motions, gestures, and smiles "made to order." A girl must be very weak who feels flattered by such things; especially when none are so much at home in such matters as the ordinary class of young gentlemen."

"Now, Mary Ann, if I did not know you, I should say that you were decidedly ill-natured. Especially when your remarks have a direct reference to Algernon Powers, who has never given you cause—indeed, with whom you can scarcely be said to be acquainted."

"Had you lived in the days when this old tower was in its glory, when the knights of yore perilled life and limb for woman, then you would have been very much at home, I trow," returned Mary Ann.

"But we live in no such days. Gallantry now is a very homely affair, and even in those days, it was quite mechanical. I do not like these "matters of course." If a person of either sex takes notice of any good quality which I may possess, and pleases to speak of it, with honesty and sincerity, I must naturally be gratified by it; but when I have every reason to believe that a poor youth is taking great pains to keep a smile upon his countenance and to utter agreeable things, I feel sorry that I should be the occasion of so much trouble to him."

"Yet, you would be displeased if he were to be wanting in common gallantry," said the other. "For my part, I am pleased with these delicate attentions."

"Yes, Algernon picked up your white handkerchief in the garden, yesterday, and presented it to you with a bow, thus saving you from the possible loss of property to the amount of two shillings sterling, but William Howard plunged into the sea, during a storm, and saved the life of your younger brother. The comparative value of the two actions, I leave you to estimate—the one is a delicate attention, the other is—"

"No more than any spirited young man would do," interrupted Rhoda. "Do you not suppose that Algernon would plunge into the sea to rescue me, or you, from drowning? Such occasions for the display of courage, do not often occur."

"We have no right to decide that Algernon would do as much, if it were not for the unfortunate circumstance that he is unacquainted with the manly art of swimming," said Mary Ann. "As he cannot swim, he could save neither of us. But he may do very well to pick up cambric handkerchiefs."

"This is unjustifiable," was the reply of Rhoda. "Why do you mock a young gentleman, about whom you know nothing?"

"I speak so, not from wantonness, but because when your brother was extolling the noble daring of a young naval officer, this Algernon turned up his dainty nose, and declared that he knew the individual, and had laughed himself to death more than once to see the awkward figure which he cut in a drawing room. I am not pleased with the delicate attentions of such men."

"Behold!" cried Rhoda, "the two gentlemen have come out in search of us. They are passing yonder stile."

Mary Ann turned and saw Algernon and her cousin approaching. While they stood surveying the young men, two persons came out of a grove in their rear who were unperceived by them. They consisted of a tall, slender man, remarkably straight, though advanced in years, and a bonny black eyed girl, not quite so tall as beauty requires, but of excellent symmetry, and regular though tawny features. She was dressed fantastically, and wore on her head a light green bonnet which became her well, though it was carelessly thrown upon her head, and the wide ribbons hung dangling from either side.

The two strangers had nearly reached the spot where the girls stood, before they were observed. Then, the girls had missed sight of the young men, who had turned down a narrow lane formed by trees which met together at the top. Therefore, the girls turned away, and beheld the two strangers. They started with surprise on perceiving that two persons had approached so near them, without their knowledge, and they looked timidly at the man whose blackened features and grisly beard gave him a savage appearance, but he smiled, and that so far changed the expression of his countenance that they feared no longer. The girl stepped lightly forward, leaving the man, who lingered in the background as if fearful of alarming the ladies. Although Mary Ann had seen many accomplished young ladies, upon whom much money had been expended, to teach them the art of pleasing, yet she thought she never had seen one who exhibited a more delightful air, or whose manners were more prepossessing than those of this poor wandering daughter of the wild.

'We have come,' said she, fixing her large black eyes upon the countenances of the girls—'to see if you would have your fortunes told.'

Rhoda glanced slyly at her companion, and seemed to await her reply.

'You need not fear,' continued the gipsy girl—'for yours will be a sunny fortune.'

'Nay, then, how do you tell our fortunes?' inquired Mary Ann.

'By the lines of the hand'—said the gipsy.

'Indeed! how then do you know that our fortunes will be bright, since our hands are gloved?'

'Yes!' cried Rhoda—'you have not seen our hands—you began too soon. Now will you not confess yourself an impostor?'

The gipsy girl said not a word, but pointed with her finger towards a little hut which the brothers of Rhoda had built, at a short distance off, and which the gipsy had passed on her way to the tower. This little hut, the boys had covered all over with mortar, and the girls on passing it, had put their hands against it to see if the mortar was dry, leaving the prints of their hands upon it.

The girl, therefore, pointed to the hut, Mary Ann understood her, but Rhoda signified that she did not.

'Your gloves were off when you left the prints of your hands on the hut'—said she.

Rhoda was surprised, and looked earnestly at Mary Ann, who only smiled.

Rhoda pulled off her glove, and held out her hand. The pretty gipsy took hold of her taper fingers and held them firmly with her left hand, while she explored the lines with the forefinger of her right hand. She had searched the lines several moments—occasionally seeming perplexed—without uttering a word. At length, she began to move her lips, though no sound was audible. Then she began in a slow chaunt, and with a voice of ineffable sweetness:—

'Many days of gleesome mirth—
Long years of thoughtless joy;
These thy portion are on earth,
Yet not without alloy.

A sorrow in thy twentieth year,
Soon after that, another—
A husband on his bloody bier
Slain by an angry brother!

She then became silent, and continued to pore over the lines of Rhoda's hand. She, at length seemed to have reached a point which aroused her attention. She glanced frequently at the countenance of Rhoda, and again at the hand which she held. The poor, girl, by this time, looked quite pale.

Mary Ann looked on, but with so stone-like a countenance that her cousin could not but regard her as very unfeeling. At length the gipsy spoke—

'Lady fair, beware a stranger—
Know him by this token,
He hath been a heartless ranger,
Sacred vows are broken!

Gay her heart when first he met her,
Gay as yours is beating now;
False was he, but not Lucetta,
He alone has broke the vow!

Mark ye well when next you meet him—
How his looks are stern and proud;
Say "Lucetta!" when you greet him,
And those lofty looks are bowed.'

The gipsy girl then threw away the hand of Rhoda—'but shall I marry this wicked man?' asked she.

'Oh, yes—marry a man of that sort, if you please, Madam,' said the gipsy girl, coloring deeply. Rhoda was ashamed to ask another question: and she took the hand of Mary Ann. The latter was evidently little interested in the matter. She gave her hand with a careless smile, and while the gipsy was surveying the lines of her hand, her eyes were cast down, the long yellow fringes covering the iris, as if she had been in a slumber. The gipsy spoke:

'Mighty is the boundless ocean,
Tho' her sluggish waters sleep—
Dreadful is their wild commotion,
When the tempest wakes the deep!

Mary Ann looked up, and was now interested; for she had always been told, by those who knew her best, that beneath the surface of her apathy lay deep, wild, and passionate feelings, and that when she was once aroused by some beloved object, her love would be violent and enduring. The gipsy paid no attention to the change of manner which she betrayed, but continued:

'When mountains fall and valleys rise
And swallows turn to eagles;
When tigers heed the lambkins cries,
And foxes herd with beagles,
Then thou shalt see that equal day
In all its splendor dawning;
The clouds of heaven pass away
In an eternal morning!'

'Strange!' said Mary Ann, turning to her cousin.

'This poor gipsy certainly favors my theory.—There is no gentle blood in her veins, yet what manners, and what a singular discernment—does she really know my thoughts? She could have picked up nothing of this kind in this neighborhood.'

'Let us go!' said the other, shuddering, 'I do not feel well.'

'We will go,' returned the other, not forgetting to drop a piece of silver into the hand of the gipsy girl, who received it very courteously, yet Mary Ann thought that her eyes did not express that delight with which people of her cast generally received heavy coin.

'You will call at the house?' said she.

'If you wish it—to-morrow'—said the gipsy girl, running off towards her companion who had waited for her with a degree of patience hardly to have been expected.

'Did you not observe the decorous conduct of that gipsy man?' said Mary Ann—'how he kept at a respectful distance, and the courtesy with which he treated even his tawny companion. Surely gentle blood could not have conducted with more propriety!'

'I thought not of that,' said Rhoda, 'I only thought of the dreadful prophecy.'

'A husband slain by a brother!' said Mary Ann, smiling, 'but heed it not.'

'Oh, no, something else,' said Rhoda, 'the falsehood of a lover, the treachery of one who should offer his hand to me.'

'But you have no lover, my dear child. Therefore that need not alarm you.'

Just then the two young men came out of the lane. Algernon advanced at a quick pace. 'We have been conversing on important matters,' said he, 'and as we saw you were engaged, we did not interfere.'

Rhoda smiled, and Algernon took his station at her side, while her brother walked with Mary Ann.

The conversation is not worth repeating. In good time, they reached the house, and then Rhoda's brother beckoned her into another room. She was gone half an hour, when she came out, 'blushing like the morn.'

At the first convenient opportunity, she told Mary Ann that Algernon had proposed in form for her, although he had said nothing to her on the subject; 'and,' said she, 'I will pronounce the magic word to him.'

'What word is that?' cried Mary Ann.

'Have you so soon forgotten? It is Lucetta,' said the other.

Mary Ann told her she would do well not to heed the gipsy's prophecy on this occasion, but treat Algernon well, as she deemed him a very suitable match for her. But Rhoda said it would do no harm to pronounce 'the magic word.'

On the next morning, as soon as breakfast was concluded, the two youths proposed a walk. The girls arranged their toilette, and sallied forth with them. They had no sooner got through the Park gate, than Rhoda said aloud to Mary Ann, 'Don't you think that Lucetta is a very pretty name?'

Both girls looked steadfastly at Algernon. He suddenly turned away his face, but Rhoda was not to be baffled, and pretending not to be taken with a flower that grew on the other side, she ran towards it, and as she plucked it, looked up at her lover, who again turned away his face from her, but exposed it to Mary Ann. It was first pale and then red. Then the color gradually faded away, and left a deadly paleness on his cheek. He endeavored to keep up a conversation, and evidently avoided the eyes of Rhoda. She placed herself once more by his side, and commenced a conversation on botany. By degrees, the equanimity of her lover was restored. He talked of some queer pranks at college performed by the younger students.

'There was an old woman who kept a beer shop,' said he; 'she had a daughter some seventeen years old, who used to wait upon the collegians, and she always made a distinction, giving the commoners beer in a pewter mug, but for the sons of noblemen she used glass.'

'A queer notion,' said Rhoda, innocently. 'Her name was not Lucetta, was it?'

He started with surprise, looked at her keenly, and said, 'You are very partial to that name, my dear lady—but his lips trembled, and the laugh with which he ended his speech, was wild and hollow.'

'I have heard that name mentioned recently,' said she.

'Ah!' said he, 'who has been so attentive to Miss Guest's interest as to mention it?'

'A gipsy—the one you saw—she told my fortune.'

He laughed, and he now laughed naturally. His mind was evidently much relieved—'Gipseys say any thing and every thing,' said he. 'But what did she say in connection with it?'

'She said that I must beware of one who had beguiled and proved faithless to a maiden of gay and buoyant feelings.'

Algernon was evidently struck, and became thoughtful. He, however, continued his 'delicate attentions,' and at length, Rhoda became as much interested in him as ever, having forgotten the gipsy's warning, and becoming intoxicated with the flattering compliments which he bestowed upon her. They had reached the end of their walk, and were about returning home, when Mary Ann beheld the gipsy girl coming over the lawn, and advancing towards them. Algernon and Rhoda were too deeply engaged in conversation, and too much interested in each other to perceive her. She walked directly up to Rhoda, however, and said, 'I have come, according to promise, to make that visit.'

'I did not invite you,' said Rhoda, petulantly.

Rhoda's brother drew near, and begged to know if she was the gipsey girl who had spoken of Lucetta. The girl said—

'I told your sister, when I met her,
To speak the name of one Lucetta.'

'For what cause, my pretty gipsey?' said the youth.

'Because the shaft that's pierced a dove,
Is sharp enough to pierce another;
And if your sister is in love,
Then vengeance should possess her brother.'

'You are harsh, my little gipsey—what if I should approve the match?'

The gipsey shook her head and said—

'You've heard, I trow, of a collier's daughter,
Betrayed when her father was on the water:
Suppose your sister was that maid,
Suppose your sister was betrayed!'

'I would scorn the reptile, and drive him from me, forever,' said the young man.

'Suppose your sister had no brother,
Her father lost upon the sea—
The comfort of her widowed mother,
Hard were then her destiny.'

The young man turned to Algernon. 'You hear the strange talk of this gipsey—what does it mean?'

'Some scandal she has picked up,' answered the other, and then dropping a piece of silver into her hand, he bade her retire.

'No, Algernon,' said she, 'It is not silver that can buy my silence. I am that Lucetta to whom you plighted your vows, and whom you deserted when my father's untimely death had enabled you to do so with impunity.'

The youth was astonished to find in the disguised and pretended gipsey the victim of his heartlessness. Mary Ann no longer wondered that this girl had so faithfully depicted her own condition; as she recognized the poor Lucetta as one of the companions of earlier years to whom she had revealed her inmost thoughts. Rhoda moved off slowly, casting back looks of scorn at the betrayer, while her brother said—'Henceforth, Algernon, you and I must be strangers!'

Thus scorned and deserted, Algernon stood a monument of woe and chagrin, when Lucetta stepped up to him, and said—'But I, oh! Algernon—I will not forsake you, if the deserted Lucetta may share your joys and your sorrows—'

'On that condition, you may be my friend again'—said Rhoda's brother.

'And mine'—said Rhoda.

'And mine'—said Mary Ann.

'Virtue and Truth are best, after all,' said Algernon, 'and I here renew my vows to the orphan Lucetta, whom I always loved, though a roving and inconstant disposition has led me to seek another.'

Algernon was as good as his word, and he has since been heard to say that true happiness in the marriage state is found only by pursuing a strictly honorable course, and above all in adhering to those earliest vows which are made while the heart is young and unpolluted, and much more capable of forming a judicious choice than it is after the heart has become hardened and blinded by the god of this world.

THE HUNGARIAN CAPTIVE.

BY MRS. L. A. MILLER.

BRIGHTLY the parting sun-light fell
In Turkish mosque and citadel,
Making the silver crescent seem
Still brighter in its lingering gleam;—
Telling the wearied Christian slave,
His daily task was almost o'er;
When to a brother captive chained,
He'd stretch his limbs, to sleep once more.

Oh! there are moments when the gleam,
Of sun, or moon, or limpid stream,
Brings memories of other years
Home to our hearts, which cause the tears
To flow, as youthful scenes, again
Come thronging in the wildered brain;—
Making, while bound by fancy's chain,
What once was pleasure, now a pain.
Strange feelings, thus, a varying train,
Rushed wildly through the captive's heart,
When the sun brightened at its wane,
Making his pulses all to start.—
Again, he gambols through the fields,—
A happy child—and now he wields
The ponderous sword, as when in youth
He tried it first—now owns the truth
Of her, his chosen, by his side—
Now turns to clasp her as his bride.

'Alas! vain phantasies!' he cried,—
'Oh! when will cease the burning pain,
To dream of home and all I love,
Then wake beneath this galling chain;—
Wake to more keenly feel the smart
Of slavery's foul and venom'd dart?'

He ceased and sighed. With harsh, rough tone,
His keeper bade him seek his tent;
Calling him 'Idle Christian dog,'

And muttering curses as he went.
But now he's lying on the ground,
With nought to break the stillness round,
Save the quick breathing of the slave,
Chained to his side, and the soft note
Of Eastern Poets' favorite bird—
The bulbul, with its mellow throat.

Lo, how he starts! A voice, as 't were
Of angel, comes his heart to cheer!
His ransom's paid! How speedily,
Urged on by swift Fidelity,
Forward he spurred his courser fleet,
With bounding heart his bride to greet;
While strange emotions filled his breast—
Feelings, no tongue hath e'er expressed,
But which, his eyes full plainly told,
Though he a warrior was, and bold.

Within his peaceful home once more,
Recovered from his toil and pain,
His heart beats high to arm for fight,
And meet the Moslem hosts again.
His warlike summons forth has gone:—
Swift as the winds, 'tis onward borne;—
With haste, around his banner bright,
All filled with zeal, thronged serf and knight.
With joy the leader views his band;
Nor wait they long for his command.

'Away! speed on to meet the Turk,
We strike for the Fatherland!
To the Moslem's shrine shall we bow the knee?
For our land we fight;—we will see it free,
Or die by the Infidel brand!

'Quail not in the battle, but brave it well,
For our God is a God of trust.—
By the Christian's sword, shall the Infidel host
Fall, as leaves by the wind-spirit tost,
And in agony bite the dust.

'Around your Chief's standard ye've gathered strong,
And I know by the scornful curve
Of each manly lip, and the flashing eye,
'Neath the Christian's banner ye'd rather die,
Than Mahomet's worshippers serve.

'Then mount each one on his battle steed,
With his good lance in his hand;
And the strong right arm of the God of might,
Will shield you well in the holy fight:
Then joy for the Fatherland!

Long raged the battle; not till night
Ended that fierce and bloody fight:
And well that field of slaughter told
The Christian hosts were firm and bold;
They saw their foemen lay around,
Wounded and dead, upon the ground;
Then knelt they on the trampled sod,
Each giving heartfelt praise to God,
For the good guidance of his hand,
Then shouted 'Joy for Fatherland!'

THE MINISTER'S WIFE.

AN eccentric clergyman in giving out a hymn at a Dedication of a church, which hymn was written by the pastor's companion, gave it out as written by the Pastress of the society. A brother minister who sat by me archly remarked, 'I did not know that we came to install two!' I have frequently thought of this circumstance when I have heard such free comments as are frequently made in reference to the Minister's wife, as though she was, verily, as much an overseer as her husband. But we have, however, no idea of penning any exhortation in respect to this matter; we only wish to ask attention to the following extract of a private letter which fell under our eye once, and from which we begged the following extract. It is an earnest soul and a true heart that breathes and beats in these passages, and the frank expression of thought and feeling here given cannot fail of doing good. We cannot think the writer will reproach us for this use of her honest thoughts, for no one will be able to divine who the author is. We answer no guessing.

'I cannot claim an uncommonly sensitive heart, yet I find it hard to bear with those around me, who say, and tell me too, that "it is the duty of the Minister's wife to devote her whole time and strength to the ladies in the society," whether they return the devotion, or pass it by unheeded as a trifling thing. I acknowledge, it is my duty to call on the sick and the well often, and to feel interested in them and theirs; but it is very painful to me to receive no returning call—nothing that indicates a cordial sympathy, or even common politeness and respect.'

'Do you think I am repining at my lot? Oh, no! very far from that. But I do think the duties and trials of a clergyman's wife are but poorly understood and are wrongly estimated by a great many. I think the ladies in societies too often look upon the minister's wife as their servant, instead of a companion and fellow laborer in the vineyard of our Master in Heaven. I refer particularly to visiting, now. The relation between the sisters of a society and the faithful minister's wife, is not the least of interesting, holy ties, which bind woman to woman. Yet we are often led to suppose that it is regarded as unimportant and unmeaning, except when it is considered as an exalted one, that places one woman far above another, whereto none can arrive save the minister's wife. This may be the result of education in part; yet I believe it is oftener the result of indifference on the part of the ladies. They will not consider the relation one that demands mutual attention, mutual expressions of love and interest, and mutual exertions. It is of no consequence to many individuals that they neglect to call on the minister's wife for a whole year; but should she neglect them notwithstanding the many, many individuals she must visit in the course of the year, then coolness, bitterness, and oftentimes detraction are engendered.'

'Perhaps you will think, my dear sister, that I forget the clergyman himself and the many discouraging circumstances, of a like nature, that he is called to endure. You are wrong, sister. I often wonder that he does not faint—that he is not discouraged. Still he can publicly defend himself; and his brother ministers are ever ready to advocate his cause, to teach the duties between pastor and people. But who will speak for us? Who will intercede in behalf of woman, to defend her in this relation and represent the duties of it as they really exist, faithfully portraying it? Perhaps it is an unsuitable theme for the pulpit; it is certainly a very delicate one for a minister to discuss himself among his parishioners.'

SABBATH DAY THOUGHTS.

BY MRS. SEBA SMITH.

'I CARE not, Fortune, what you me deny;
You cannot rob me of free nature's grace;
You cannot shut the windows of the sky,
Through which Aurora shows her brightening face;
You cannot bar my constant feet to trace
The woods and lawns, by living stream at eve:
Let health my nerves and finer fibres brace,
And I their toys to the great children leave.
Of fancy, reason, virtue, nought can me bereave.'

THOMSON.

THE next day was the blessed Sabbath. It would seem as if even nature were made to harmonize with the divine spirit of rest. The little winds scarce rustled the leaf upon the tree, and the white clouds floated in the blue sky like the drapery of invisible spirits. Not a discordant sound broke upon the ear; every thing was hushed to quietude, except the sweet music of the birds that every where filled the air with melody. The young blossoms opened their dewy petals with a freshness and beauty according well with the renovating character of the day. Little do those know, who permit the cares and labors of the week to encroach upon this sacred period of repose, how much they wrong the body, as well as the spirit.

To the little family of our story, the Sabbath was always hailed with peculiar pleasure. The employments of the week were always so arranged that nothing should disturb the quiet serenity of this holy day. The simple labors of the household were quickly despatched; and when the weather was fine, the open windows, around which the woodbine and honey-suckle formed a curtain of perfume and verdure, the glasses filled with flowers neatly arranged, and the Bible, with other choice books, spread upon the table, imparted to the whole domain an air of taste and intelligence, often wanting in the houses of the wealthy. They might be poor, according to the common acceptation of the term, but could never be vulgar.

This was the only day which Mr. Cleveland could devote to his family, his business as a mechanic requiring his whole attention the other six days of the week, in order to meet their daily expenses. This circumstance contributed to make it still more a day of rest to his excellent wife, who found herself relieved of the incessant care of little Edward, and in part of her attendance upon the elder Mr. Cleveland, whose infirmities daily increased. George and Mary, too, directed the innumerable questions of childhood to their father, instead of their mother, on this day; and Mr. Cleveland, with a manner in which kindness and dignity were happily blended, led the minds of his children to subjects worthy of their contemplation; now teaching a lesson of wisdom from the experience of past ages, and now inculcating some lofty truth, from the examination of a flower, or the construction of a crystal. There is not a leaf or shrub, a ray of light, a shadow on the hill side, or an insect in the summer air, but is full of truth and beauty, to those who have the faculty to perceive it. Thus thought Mr. Cleveland, and he lived up to this conviction. He doubted not the intelligence and moral strength of his children would reward him for his pains. And most ably was he sustained by his amiable and strong-minded wife. With none of the petty ambition and weak vanity of the sex, Mrs. Cleveland was perfectly feminine and possessed a refined taste and strong native intellect. Strangers thought her handsome, a circumstance never regarded by her friends, who were in the habit of witnessing the excellence of her mind and heart.

We have said it was the Sabbath. As the twilight softly gathered upon the earth, and the birds began to twitter upon the branches, the family strolled out to enjoy the freshness and verdure of the delightful season. George and Mary took care of Edward, who seemed 'to feel his life in every limb.' Now he plucked the clovers and butter-cups, and now flung all aside and tottled off in pursuit of a butterfly. Anon he tumbled into the green grass, and tossed his white arms, and played bo-peep through the clustering leaves, his eyes and white teeth gleaming out like gems and pearls.

Mr. and Mrs. Cleveland gave each an arm to the old gentleman, walking slowly and cautiously to suit the infirmities of age.

'Ah, my children,' he said, 'beautiful and salutary as is this rest of one day in seven, it is glorious to feel, that there yet remaineth a rest for the people of God. Not the cold, insensible sleep of the grave, but a rest from toil, from temptation, and infirmity. Oh, it is good to think of these things, "ere the sun, or the light, or the moon, or the stars be darkened, or the clouds return after the rain." For me the silver cord is loosed, and the golden bowl of earth is broken; desire has failed, and the grasshopper is a burden. I long now for a city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. And now, Lord, what wait I for? my hope is in thee.' His voice ceased, but his lips moved, as if in prayer. They had seated the aged one on a rustic bench beneath the overhanging branches of an old oak tree.

'Oh, this peace, this quietude,' he continued, 'it seems to raise the weight from my senses. Hush! I hear the young birds in the branches, and the insects from the green earth. The odor of wild blossoms steals over me as it did in years gone by; and the warm summer air fans my cheek with a sensation it gave me in my boyhood. Is not that the ripple of the brook down by the mill? Yes, yes, it is becoming every moment more distinct. I had never thought to hear it again. And the shadow is removed from the hill side. I see the clouds floating in the sky, and the spire of the old church where I loved to meet with the people of God. Oh, if the longing soul can thus overcome the obstacles of a decayed body, how glorious must be its perceptions, when it shall have shaken off this mortal covering. My children, this gleam of youth in the midst of the ruins of age, admonishes me that my lamp must be trimmed and burning, for the bridegroom is at hand.'

He leaned heavily upon his son's arm, and arose. He turned to the green woods, to the blue sky, the far-off waters, the cultivated landscape, and drank in the whole prospect, as things he might never see again: then leaning on the arms of his children, returned to the house.

It was evident the convictions of the old gentleman were about to be realized. On his return, he retired to his bed, and seemed much exhausted. He desired to be left alone, but the door should remain open that he might hear the evening songs of the family.

After having sung various hymns adapted to the capacities of the children, Mr. Cleveland commenced the grand and appropriate notes of Old Hundred, to the words,

'Be thou, O God, exalted high'— and the trembling voice of age joined with touching pathos in the melody.

When the hymn had ceased, all remained silent for some time.

'Father,' said George, 'I should be unwilling to love my friends any less, but I sometimes think we are not so happy for loving so well.'

'We must fix our affections upon worthy objects, George, and we cannot love them too well. We must not love them for wealth, or beauty, or accomplishments; but only so far as they are assimilated to the perfection of Him who is perfect in holiness. If we love deeply, we must love worthily, even for those qualities that never perish—that time or death cannot change, but serve only to exalt and purify. I would have your standard of excellence high; then you will be less likely to be turned aside by the accidental circumstances of wealth or beauty.'—[Selected.]

THE COMPLAINER AND THE ANGEL.

ONE night when the stars were in the sky,
And the birds had gone to rest,
And childhood had sunk in peaceful dreams
On the patient mother's breast;
There was heard a troubled mortal's voice
In a chamber old and lone,
And the winds bore on their wandering wings,
The sad complainer's tone.

'I have walked,' he murmured, 'from youth till now,
In the paths of equity,
And have freely cast on the waves my bread,
But it comes not back to me.
I have clad the poor, and the hungry fed,
And cheered the child of toil,
And poured on the faint by the wayside laid,
The healing balm and oil.

Yet the Father hath blessed me not with wealth,
Nor a high, imperial name;
While the proud of earth wear the regal crown,
And the deathless wreath of fame.
Then an angel bright was heard to speak,
While a glorious light shone round;
'O, mortal! thou look'st for the peace without,
Which alone in the heart is found.

If thou seek'st the Lord with a spirit meek,
He will ne'er from thee depart;
Though the purple robe, and the fame of earth,
Be not for the pure in heart.
But he who doeth his Father's will,
Hath a more than earthly meed;
Though the things of earth reward him not,
He is blessed in each righteous deed.' P. C.

MILLERISM : ITS GOOD EFFECTS.

BY REV. JOHN G. ADAMS.

TO THE candid observer in the theological world, it is well known that ever since the open introduction of the doctrine of Universal Grace and Salvation into our religious community, it has encountered from almost every quarter, continued opposition. And much of this opposition has been of the virulent and irrational kind;—not an appeal to sober fact—a direct and honest reference to the law and the testimony,—but too often a warfare of contumely, reproach, and sheer falsehood. Professing Christians have thus joined issue with it, as if they supposed its destruction might be effected by such exertions! that this or any other doctrine whether true or false could be eradicated by means so foreign to the sure influences of Christ and his gospel!

In this course, we believe our brethren have erred; in this course we believe they still err;—and while we do not pretend to justify in every respect, the treatment they have received in return from those they have thus despitely used and persecuted,—yet we must be permitted to declare it as our opinion, that in the main we have not only received no essential injury from their resistance to our sentiments, but that in consequence of this very opposition, our cause has advanced ten, if not thirty fold. That our controversialists have always been governed in their theological conflicts by the kindness, courtesy, and forbearance of the complete Christian, is what we are not so mistaken as to avow. They have been grievously abused; and while in the excitement occasioned by warfare upon them, have doubtless at times been led to render 'railing for railing,' instead of following that better apostolic injunction—'contrawise blessing.' While we say this, however, we have no fear of instituting a comparison with the defenders and opposers of Universalism on the ground of Christian Charity. But this we only mention by the way.

For, beyond all this, we are looking to ulterior effects. This settled and too often, we fear, unprincipled hostility to God's truth, has occasioned controversy of the most searching kind. For thirty years just passed, our theological community hath been stirred to its very depths; and while it is to be regretted that so much of bitterness and so little of love have been manifested therein, yet we have abundant reason to rejoice that God has made the place of his feet glorious in the advancement of the gospel of his Son. Human opposition in this conflict has but added another evidence in confirmation of the language of Paul, that men 'can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth.' Amid all these severe encounters, the great doctrine that 'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself,' has gone on prospering and to prosper. 'The little one has become a thousand; the small one a great people;—the wilderness and solitary place has been made glad, and the desert has rejoiced and blossomed as the rose.' The wrath of man has been made to praise and honor the Most High.

We have before us at the present time one striking manifestation of human wisdom, or rather 'folly' in contrast with Divine Truth, which cannot fail of being instructive to the discriminating and devout mind. All along in the past, during our controversies, we have besought the opponents of our doctrine to turn their attention particularly to those passages of Scripture supposed by them to treat of a judgment yet to come, when Christ would personally appear, when this material world would be consumed, and men adjudged either to eternal torment or felicity, according to their religious belief and conduct while in the present existence.

We have given them what we have considered rational interpretations of those passages,—endeavoring to show that so far from having reference to the future, they have had their fulfillment in past time, and have expressly and repeatedly and almost continually called upon our dissenting friends who supported the popular orthodoxy of the day, to show us wherein we were amiss in our interpretations. But in too many instances, our answers have only been studied and dignified silence, dishonest quibbling, or insolent abuse. Strange sayings, indeed; but no more strange than true. Entrenched behind the array of numbers, and feeling secure in a public opinion, this old theology of error hath supposed itself for a time secure, and hath boldly persisted in the repetition of the course already named,—as though error was always to rear its head in triumph when everlasting truth was in the field against it! 'There are many devices in a man's heart; nevertheless the counsel of the Lord that shall stand.' And they who oppose this counsel, must ultimately witness the destruction of their erroneous pretensions—the utter futility of their warfare against God and his word of truth.

Recently, as if to take the opposing wisdom of man in its own craftiness, a new theory has been broached concerning the Second Advent—the coming of Christ—the destruction of the material world—and the separation of believers and unbelievers. Conceived in ignorance, and matured by the most flaming fanaticism of our land, this theory during the past year has gained advocates on every hand. Its chief expounders have seized upon the very texts of Scripture so constantly adduced by the opponents of Universalism in proof of the yet future coming of Christ and the end of the material world,—and by a series of reasonings which they themselves are best competent to understand, have endeavored to make it apparent to an unbelieving world that in these very days—in this very year, the coming and the end will take place.

So widely has this delusion prevailed, that it could not escape the notice of our chief theologians. The new heresy threatened the 'visible church'—i. e., it made inroads upon it; and many who had hitherto been considered well settled in the old opinions, were suddenly drawn forth in vindication of the new.

And now on every hand comes out the attempted refutation of this new theory. The learned professor in the Theological Institution, and the parish minister in his study and pulpit send out their reasonings against this strange infatuation. And how could they answer it? We mean those who retained the old notions of Christ's yet future personal coming and the destruction of the material world? That the Universalist might successfully encounter this delusion,—that he has successfully encountered it, we think, is true. But what had those to say who gave modern Millerism all its materials, and whose theory of the Second Advent differs in no essential point save in the fixing of the very time of Christ's coming?

Indeed—they could only answer this new faith by approaching nearer the ground of Universalism! by giving in many instances just such interpretations of the passages already alluded to as have been urged upon them in time past by the leading controversial writers of our own denomination. If there is any doubt of this, let the reader consult the recent works of Professors Stuart and Bush, eminent theological men, and they will have ample conviction of the truth of my affirmation. And so of other writers against this new divinity. I have just noted an extract from a work recently issued on this subject in a neighboring city, in which the author among other interpretations, assures us that the passage in Daniel xii. 2, 'And many that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt,' had its fulfillment ages ago,—the very declaration against which, had not Millerism arisen, this author might now have been contending!

And what do these things signify? What but that out of all this delusion, and commotion and darkness, God will bring the triumphs of his holy truth? Even this fanaticism, then, hath its mission. And though we mourn that ignorance and superstition and besotted credulity have so far taken captive the minds of our fellow men, as to lead them to gaze after signs in the firmament, and be frightened even unto death when some neighboring conflagration was seen—and to be taken in consequence of religious insanity to the hospitals of our land—and even in their infatuation, to prepare themselves 'ascension robes,' and watch and wait unto weariness, and even to impatience and death for the appearance of their Lord to take them from the earth;—although these occurrences in this day of light and truth, considered by themselves alone, are enough to fill us with confusion and almost drive us to seek some hiding places in the very caves of the earth where we might the more freely and appropriately indulge our shame for degraded humanity; and yet, when we take all events of the past, the present, and the anticipated future into the account,—when we see, as we believe, God's hand directing his truth amid all this conflict of human interests and opinions—we have no fear—and are prepared calmly and trustingly to abide the issue.

This evil will result in good. The opinions which have gone out against it can never be recalled. If they are of the truth, so much has been done for the truth by their dissemination. When the tempest shall have spent its force, then will come the calm and the clear sunshine of reason and faith, in which men made wiser by experience, shall go on unto perfection.

THE REDEEMED.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

THY praise was on the lips of men—
They called thee good and great;
And oh! my heart with gladness, then,
And triumph was elate.
To see thee move a chief mid those
Who feel the spell of worth,
To track thy footsteps as they rose
Above the sons of earth,—
Oh this was joy and happy pride—
A glimpse of life divine—
For truer hearts was ne'er allied
To thee, dear friend, than mine.

Then came the dark and desolate day
Of sin, and wo, and shame;
And all along thy pathway lay
The lava's lurid flame.
No longer sought thy hands the grasp
Of hearty love and pride;
They met thee with a chilling clasp,
Or coldly turned aside.
And I, oh! bitterly indeed,
I wept thy shameful fall;—
But yet my heart did not recede—
I loved thee through it all!

I loved thee; and I trusted still
That thou wouldst yet redeem
By thy strong, earnest, moral will,
Thy soul from death's dark stream.
I trusted that temptation's sway,
O'er spirit high as thine,
Like some hot plague would pass away,
And leave thee at God's shrine.
I trusted that the giant strength
Of virtue in thy soul,
Would break the withs of sin at length,
And rise from its control.

Oh thanks to God! 'Twas not in vain
I nerved my heart with faith,
For thou art all thyself again,
Redeemed from shame and death.
Thy hand with dauntless nerve hath set
The seal upon thy vow,
And now I know when thou'rt beset,
Thy virtue will not bow.
Oh joy! Let angels catch the strain
And fill the courts above,
To welcome back to heaven again
The prodigal they love.

Oh joy! A thousand erring souls
Are stronger than before!
And fiercely tho' temptation rolls,
Will safely reach the shore.
When thou wert chief among the men
Who walk in wisdom's way,
Most excellent I thought thee then,
And glorified thy sway.

But oh ! to see thee spurn the tide
Of sin, and death, and shame,
And prove to those who sink, a guide
To honor and good fame ;

To see thee hold out hope to those
Who, faint, and weak, and worn,
Dread to perceive the dark waves close
And hide the glimmering bourne ;
Oh friend, I tell thee ne'er hath yet
My heart felt such a tide,
As that which now o'ermantles it
With gratitude and pride.
Joy ! joy ! Oh ! ever may my soul
Increase His bright renown,
Who helped thee reach the lofty goal,
And win the VICTOR'S CROWN !

BREVITIES ; OR THOUGHTS FOR ODD MOMENTS.

BY HENRY BACON.

THE DEATH OF THE YOUNG.

I HAVE seen many of the young waste away and die. It was hard for them to turn aside from the gay world and deem themselves incapable of enjoying its pleasant things. Weary and more weary became 'the bed of languishing,' and pains severe and severer tried the patience of the soul. Memory turned the leaves of the mystic records of the past, and the sweet lines written by Hope, with a pen dipped in the light of her own smiles, shone as beautifully as ever ; yea, more beautiful as the colors of dying Autumn, or the hues of the foam of the wave, just as it breaks upon the shore. Every thought recalled some lovely vision that once pleased the fancy, and in which the heart delighted to expatiate. Like ice laid on the naked flesh, came the first thought of death ; and 'It is hard to die !' was the deep feeling of the soul. The struggle, the robe, the pall, the solemn gathering, the grave ! all came before the imagination, and they could not but ask for life. Life was given as they were afterward taught to ask for it—the life of heaven. The teachings of our holy and ever blessed faith, the heavenly instructions of Jesus the Beloved, were offered to the ear and it heard. The mind understood, and the heart believed. How wonderful the change ! 'There is more to die for than to live for !' was then the feeling of the soul. Calmly and sweetly hand after hand was taken, lip after lip was pressed, breath mingled with breath, as the last whispers were uttered, and the spirit departed with a smile like the last flash of the sun on a snowy cloud. Thus do the young die when Universalism has done its divine work for the spirit ; and as beautifully will the young live, when the heart has received of the unction of that same best gift of God.

COURAGE.

THANK God for Courage ! courage that will not falter though the way be long, the hill high, the storm fierce and wild, and multitudes of voices cry—'You'll fail !' There is no failure to the man of true courage. If he work not out the project to which he gives himself—if he gather not to his standard true soldiers of progress—if he meet all that Napoleon met as he climbed the Alps, and be turned back by omnipotent antagonisms, yet he has not failed ; he has unfolded in himself new strength and gathered new aids from stern Experience. When he goes forth again, he proves that to him even defeats are victories—that triumphs over him in the past, have been like sleep that bows and chains its subject, but is thrown off by the soul which has been invigorated by it. True courage is borne of high and pure aspirations—an ardent longing after moral excellence—a determination to appreciate more and more the endowments of our nature and develop the strength and harmonies of our spiritual being. Where true courage lives, no obstacles can be too great to be overcome. Its faith is the faith that overcomes the world. 'The intent and not the deed is in our power ; and therefore who dares greatly, does greatly.'

THE ADVENT OF JESUS.

THE choral song of the angels of the Advent should never be forgotten by the Christian. It revealed the interest of spiritual beings in the affairs of earth, and their recognition of the spirit and power of the mission that should be given to the babe of Bethlehem. They waited not for the coming forth of the Messiah in the glory of wonderful works—when he should bid the light of day flash as a new created sun on the unveiled orbs of the blind, and the thousand voices of summer pour their music into the opened ear of the deaf, or the grave to give up its charge and the dead to revive again to the life of earth ; but they came forth with the song of rapture when the eye of the holy babe first opened to the light. And it was well. Yea, more, it is well that we have the record of their song, and that we can blend its spirit with the thoughts which are naturally awakened by the sight of an infant. 'Glory to God in the highest ; peace on earth, good will towards man !' was the choral cry, uniting the sentiments of Reverence, Humanity, and Philanthropy. When these are perfected within, and the whole soul is brought into the service of this glorious trinity, man by the beauty and harmony of his life will prove the divinity of the christian law of action—'Recompense to no man evil for evil.'

This law is the law of all Heaven's dealings with man. All that Jesus Christ is to us as the ordained Savior of man, is a revelation of the glory of the divine government in overcoming evil with good—in distinguishing between that which is truly Godlike, and that which is marked with the frailty and imperfection of human nature. Man approaches to God—man becomes a partaker of the Divine nature, according as he rises to a clear and constant perception of the highest good, being connected with the exercise of the purest and most enduring sympathies.

'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself,' and hence the love of Jesus for man—for all men. Never shall we come up to the standard of Christ, till God shall be in us by his reconciling spirit, and we are 'full of grace and truth.' This is the day to pray—'Thy kingdom come!' come in our souls, come in wonderful power, come to the full subjection of 'every thought to the obedience of Christ.' O let thus God's kingdom come, and there will be prevailing might in our prayer—'Thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven!' by the spirit of filial love.

ARISTOCRACY.

'You must have your company come in at the back door, Lucy,' said the matron of the house to her waiting maid, who was a member of the matron's husband's church. This produced no little altercation, which resulted in the maid's remarking that there should not be such distinctions made between members of the same church, and adding, 'Well, I don't suppose you believe there will be any difference in Heaven, do you?' 'Any difference in Heaven,' responded the indignant mistress, 'Why! don't we read of angels and archangels?' This is a fact.

Human pride can never be sanctified—it is of the earth, earthy. It is this passion which prevents thousands from seeing the beauty and glory of the complete Redemption; they cannot bear the idea of heavenly equality, any more than they can a social equality here. They wish to be separate here, and in heaven; and if they feel they must admit those below them here, to an entrance there, it is a relish to them to believe that the humble here will only be angels there, while they themselves shall be archangels! Humility is the root of true christian virtue.

THE PAINTER.

A CELEBRATED Revivalist once visited a painter's studio, and when about to leave, was invited to call again and examine other portraits. 'I don't know that I can,' haughtily responded the Elder, 'I have as much as I can do to make portraits for heaven!'

Heaven would be a strange portrait gallery if this painter were to add many of his specimens to it. Every painter copies some favorite style, and all his portraits thereby bear the impress of the artist who executed them. The portraits of this artist are distinguished for very dark shadings that give repulsiveness to all the countenances, and mark them as the children of woe—the subjects of a comfortless religion. He who attempts to paint portraits for heaven by sulphurous flames, only shows what kind of a heaven he believes in—it is a refuge into which affrighted souls rush to escape the fire, not because they love the Master thereof.

CHRISTIAN CONTENTION.

JEREMY TAYLOR, whose wit was no mean quality, and admirably employed in theological and moral discussions, in treating of contention, remarks:—'If Christians must contend, let it be like the olive and the vine, which shall bear the most and best fruit; not like the aspen and the elm, which make the most noise in the world.' This is a beautiful idea, and peaceful would the world be were there no other contention than the contest who shall take in most of the divine influences whereby the soul grows and becomes fruitful unto the great Husbandman! 'Herein,' said the Master, 'is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit.' Blessed are the children of faith, who never permit contention to remove from them the spirit of Christ, and who are ever faithful to the warning—'A branch cannot bear fruit except it abide in the vine.' 'His beauty shall be as the olive tree.'

'HELP.'

THE use of the word help to designate household assistants, is an Americanism, and we look upon it as a right down republican term. We like it, because it suggests the true relation which should exist between domestic assistants and their employers. The help should be regarded as help, not as drudges—not as of a lower order of creatures—not to be kept separate as though it were a part of their duty to feel an inferiority. It is not station that dignifies; but faithfulness to duty gives dignity to any one; and more honorable is she who is conscientious and true in the performance of her duty as help, than is the mistress who, in pride and slothfulness, forgets what moral influence is exerted by the habits of her household, and who does nothing to improve the character or protect the virtue of her help. Those persons are the happiest whose conduct makes their domestic assistants feel they are help or aids, and not regarded as drudges and do-all's. They are like the 'virtuous' woman depicted by Solomon. One among the whole household, ready to do with them:—'She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness.'

DANGER OF DELAY IN RELIGION.

WE have met with many sermons and articles on this subject, in all of which the danger is made to refer to Eternity, and much is said of the inefficacy of 'death-bed repentance.' This shows how habitual it is for the Partialist world to regard the great blessings of Religion as pertaining to the vast future—to giving peace of conscience in death. Thus they overlook the immeasurable benefit of immediate attention to religion arising from the fitness of the soul thereby for all the relations of life. To delay in adopting a true religious rule of life, is to delay to supply each attribute of our nature with an element essential to its right action, its harmony with its relations in our being, and the exercise of its full capability to promote our happiness. Man without religion is like the atmosphere without a due proportion of electricity. According to the want in the one case and the other, will be the consequent evils. Make then no 'delay in religion'—give immediate attention to that which will become a balancing power within, and give a new, healthy and happy vitality to every attribute of the perfect man—our intellectual, moral, and religious being.

A TRUTH.

In stopping a few moments at a Book stand in Cornhill, Boston, we chanced to take up a volume of 'Beecher's Sermons,' which had probably been in the library of some orthodox clergyman. The 'fly leaves' were covered with sketches of sermons, and some pretty good we thought; but we are intending to notice an item in one only. The text was, 'Without holiness no man shall see the Lord,' which contains a philosophical truth—'for he must be pure,' says Origen, 'who would have a proper view of a pure Being.'

'All Christians,' said the sketch, 'acknowledge the necessity of Holiness. Even the Universalists do not believe that men are to be saved in their sins; they trust in a moral change by which all souls are to be made holy and fit for heaven.' We wish all preachers were as honest as that one, and would give up the frequent and most absurd assertion that Universalists would have men saved in their sins. We go for Holiness as the great law of our being—as 'the law of the spirit of life,' or spiritual life, 'in Christ Jesus.' The glory of Universalism consists in the fact, that each principle and the combination of the principles of our doctrine, tend to commend holiness to man and give him the most powerful encouragements to cultivate it.

A DEATH SCENE.

A GROUP of grief stricken friends were gathered around a dying one who was as precious to them as life itself. They waited with grieving hearts for the close of the solemn scene. She spoke—'O what music I hear! You have no conception of the music of heaven.'

'Can't you join them?' said a friend.

At this the dying one commenced singing beautifully. She sang a tune the friend had never heard, and they could only catch a word occasionally. When she had sung what seemed to be two stanzas, she paused and remarked,—'My voice is not tuned yet for heaven—but it will be soon.' And she passed away with the light of that beautiful thought resting as a smile upon her lips. It was sweet to behold it.

I have seen an unbelieving, an infidel woman. She scorned Jesus and despised his ministers. But her death was not the death of her I have just alluded to. No! the rattle of the earth on the coffin was the only sound which imagination brought to her ear, and the shadow of the last gloomy thought rested on her countenance like a frown. The eye of the looker on turned quickly away as from a sad sight.

Such contrasts must be while Faith and Unbelief exist.

CLOAK ZEAL.

ISAIAH speaks of being 'clad with Zeal as a cloak,' and of this we have been reminded by seeing two persons cloaking themselves to go out from home. One of them put on a cloak to keep him warm, that he might have the use of his limbs, and be active, the other put on a cloak to hide his garments, desiring, by the aid of a good cloak, to look well. Thus is it with religionists every where and in all sects. Some clothe themselves with zeal to be really active and improve times and opportunities to the utmost; but others put it on to hide their real clothing and make a show. And yet others wear zeal as a fashionable cloak; while those whom they follow wear the like, they will be careful to put their zeal cloak on, but are sure to throw it off when the fashionable season—the four or fifty days meeting is over.

Choose wisely, reader, how to wear zeal as a cloak.

A TRUTH FROM JUNIUS.

Who the author of Junius' letters was is still a mystery, although many books have been written to decide the matter. But whoever he was, it seems he had known some rogues and had paid some attention to the good and ill of their lives, as he says,—'After long experience of the world, I affirm, before God, I never knew a rogue who was not unhappy.' This ought to be worth something to those who dwell so much on the pleasures of sin, that they may learn that holiness, filial obedience to God, is not only to be, but is now, the soul's element of happiness. He who alone knoweth all the qualities, combinations and effects of spirit and matter, hath shown us what is good—Rectitude, benevolence and humility; do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God. This, this is bliss. This is the happiness in which the purest affections expand. This is heaven.

'KNOW THYSELF.'

At the foot of Parnassus, on the southern side, was the most celebrated Oracle of ancient Greece—Delphi. Greeting all who entered the temple and reminding them of a first duty, were the words—'Know Thyself.' Those words became a favorite maxim in philosophy, and the recollection of them kept many a one from rash speculations and injurious speech, as they reminded of the duty of scrutinizing one's own feelings and passions. Ignorance of ourselves—of what we really are, lies at the base of more than half our follies, for much wiser should we act did we oftener ask ourselves—'What fruit bringeth I in those things whereof I am now ashamed? Shall I sow more seed to reap more follies?'

Know Thyself! Study to understand thy frailties and truest wants, and come nearer and more humbly to Him who is gracious to pardon and merciful to impart wisdom.

LOCAL DEITY.

JEREMY TAYLOR has a pretty good shot at selfish sectarianism in the following singular application. He says,—'Plutarch reports that the Tyrians tied their Gods with chains, and Apollodorus tells of some who tied the image of Saturn with bands of wool upon his feet. So some Christians; they think God is tied to their sect, and bound to be of their side, and the interest of their opinion.'—Hence when a person of enlarged mind and heart leaves them, though he retain all the moral excellences of character and attend to all the practical part of christianity, they regard him as having left the locale of their Deity, and no longer regarded by him. They are far from the old idea that he that worketh righteousness in every nation is accepted of God. A right perception of the universality of God's grace, is essential to correct views of christian goodness.

ENGLISH UNITARIANS.

THE following passage from the general preface to the series of doctrines preached by the three Unitarian preachers of Liverpool, in reply to thirteen opponents, gives the common doctrine of English Unitarians respecting punishment under the Divine Government. The language about to be quoted is in reply to an assertion made by the 'thirteen clergymen of the church of England,' who proposed to confute Unitarianism;—

'It is stated that we "utterly deny" "the eternity of punishments," without adding what we have added, that the moral consequences of actions are eternal, and that in its influence on character and progress, the retribution of every evil thought or deed is everlasting. What we do deny, as the blackest misrepresentation that can be conceived of the God of Providence, whose glory it is to lead his children to Himself, is the horribly distinct statement of their own "General Preface"—"that the sufferings of the lost are not intended for their amendment, but as a satisfaction to divine justice, when the hour of pardon shall have passed away."—Is this the Religion, and this the God of Love? These are the men who make the Unbelief, of which they afterwards so blindly and bitterly complain. If such was Christianity, unbelief would be a virtue, a prompting of devotion, a protest on behalf of God.'

Some Unitarian writers in our own country, in treating of Retribution, take the same position, though not so boldly, as they do not throw themselves into the antagonistic attitude. They affirm the belief in the 'everlasting retribution' of evil thoughts and deeds, but do not state, as their English brethren demand of their opponents to state, the whole matter what they deny of the popular doctrine of eternal punishments. There is a vast difference made between punishment and consequences by these writers; as they cannot but see that according to their view of retribution, every responsible human soul must be the subject of eternal punishment, as all have thought and done evil.

They reason incorrectly when they endeavor to establish their doctrine of everlasting evil consequences. They say that time, misimproved, can never be recalled, and that a loss of good that might then have been wrought out, will be sustained by the soul forever. This, however, will not hold good, inasmuch as the loss sustained by misimprovements in the past, arouses the soul to more determined and heroic action than it otherwise might have known. Every one knows this fact, and the proverb is common that Experience is a dear schoolmaster, but gives the best lessons.

What is meant by 'the overruling Providence of God,' if the evil consequences of wrong thought and doing are to be eternal? And why do we so often meet with approbatory quotations of Thomson's words:

'I cannot go

Where Universal love smiles not around,
Sustaining all yon orbs, and all their suns;
From seeming Evil still educating Good,
And better thence again, and better still,
In infinite progression.'

Is evil an agent of God? If so, it must tend ultimately to good, and it is folly to speak of eternal evil consequences resulting from that which is the means of revealing to us the most adorable perfection of God—the Divine Forgiveness.

ZELICA.

'SHE came like a dream in the morn of life,
And she fled like a shadow before its noon.' SHELLEY.

LONG weary years have passed away
Since that fair being drooped and died;
And yet it seemeth scarce a day
Since we were rambling side by side.
O we were blest, when free from care
We wandered through the long long day,
As idly as the birds of air,
And sang a song as glad as they.

I never saw a form before
Of such unrivalled loveliness,
Nor one who was of earth who wore
The look of heaven upon her face.
I never knew a heart so kind,
Such tears for others' misery flow,
Nor saw a hand so gladly bind
The crushed and bleeding heart of woe.

Her spirit was from sin so free,
Such gladness round her path she shed,
That all, who knew her purity,
Poured blessings on her bright young head.
In this cold world I never found
But one to whom my heart was dear,
But thousand cords of love had bound
Her being to this changeful sphere.

And, like a bright and balmy day
When spring hath put her mantle on,
The future in her visions lay
Without a cloud to dim its sun.
And yet she lay, ere youth went by,
Unmurmuring on a bed of pain,
And gave, without one tear or sigh,
Her spirit to its God again.

The radiant gates of paradise
Were opened to her ravished sight,
With angels singing in the skies,
And coronals and robes of light.
She panted for that holier home,
Where they who drink shall thirst no more,
And smiled to see the angels come
To bear her to the heavenly shore.

I knew not how so blest a one
Could leave the earth so willingly,
For, though within the world alone,
The grave looked dark and chill to me.
But when her feet had trod the brink,
When the grave held a form so fair,
I would not tremble, would not shrink,
For one I loved had entered there.

O death had lost its chilling gloom
Since seen on that triumphant brow,
There were such garlands on the tomb,
I did not fear to sleep there now.
I feared not, but my heart was sad,
And my weak vision saw not why,
One who had made the earth so glad,
In the bright morn of life should die.

But now I know, that God above,
The earliest calls the good away,
To chasten hearts that bind their love
To idols that are made of clay.
For if the glory grow not dim
To those whose thoughts to earth are given,
They will not fix their trust in Him,
Nor lay their treasure up in heaven.

but he that refuseth reproof, erreth.'

LECTURE ON ELOCUTION.

THE subject of Elocution has attracted great attention the past season, and it should be attended by all who value that valuable accomplishment—the Art of Good Reading. I present here a slight sketch of a lecture I heard from Professor Greenbank, which, brief though the sketch is, will afford some good hints to readers and speakers—sufficient, at least, to suggest some improvements to some preachers. The illustrative passages are easy to be found, and therefore I have not copied them.

Elocution is an important subject—especially to citizens of a free country where opportunities are offered to every one to exercise the power of mind through speech. Every one should be interested sufficiently as to feel the importance of speaking with propriety and elegance; and so great are the advantages attendant upon possessing good elocution, that they will repay any effort, however great, necessary to obtain success. Music is a delightful accomplishment, but Elocution requires talent of a superior order, as not only is a good voice and ear necessary, but nice discrimination and accurate judgment. And does not music require this? All, indeed, cannot be good elocutionists, but all can, by study and discipline, make great improvements in the use of the powers of speech. And how frequently do we witness the force and beauty of grand ideas, and splendid passages, almost entirely lost by an inefficient delivery! The Ancients excelled in this Art. They gave great attention to voice, action, gesture,—to all that was necessary to render their ideas the most efficient in producing the effect desired.

To good elocution, just and clear articulation is of the first importance. By attention to this, a person with a weak voice can make himself better understood and by a larger audience, than one with a voice much stronger, but who is deficient in this particular. We continually hear and read, that attention should be paid strictly to sound the consonants, but more consideration should be given to the vowels. Take for instance O. How often do we hear persons say winder, instead of window—piller, instead of pillow, &c.

In order to attain to just and clear articulation, a person must stand erect, and be careful not to exhaust the lungs. If the voice be weak, read aloud in a large room, or, which is best, in the open air. Demosthenes is a remarkable example of what can be done to render a weak voice powerful, as he, though naturally possessed of a very inefficient voice, became the most powerful orator of Athens. The speaker referred to himself as an illustration; that by discipline his own voice was five times as strong as when he commenced public speaking.

One error into which weak voiced speakers fall is, the pitching the voice too high. They feel a difficulty in attempting to fill a large space, and make an effort which exhausts them and renders them faulty in finishing periods and sentences. Now it should be remembered that by sounding the lower notes, the upper notes are strengthened. It is useful, therefore, to attend to different pitches of the voice, taking some passage which requires variations—as Seutonius' address to Cato's senators;—'My voice is still for war, &c.' Or Marcellus addressing the crowd. A good rule is to begin with some word ending with the consonant N—such as on, and run up climaxes of different numbers. On! on! ON! &c.

Effort should be made by speakers to take the breath through the nostrils, as it was designed of God that we should so breathe, for we read—'He breathed into his nostrils the breath of life.' There are many dangers attendant upon public speakers breathing through the mouth. The cold air coming in contact with the throat, &c. inflamed by the exercise of earnest speaking, does harm, whereas breath coming through the nostrils, has to pass through circuitous passages, and is warmed before it reaches the lungs. Speaking by breath thus drawn in, the lecturer called the head voice. The head voice will effectually prevent Bronchitis—the throat complaint. He had cured hundreds of a tendency to this evil by teaching the use of the head voice. He gave illustrations of the use of the head voice, the throat voice, and the chest voice; the first had pre-eminence for clearness, strength and ease. The use of the chest voice brings on Consumption, where there is a tendency to that disease. He could speak, and his custom at home as a teacher was to speak, eight hours a day, and this he did without any more exhaustion than produced by the same amount of labor performed otherwise. He earnestly recommended public speakers to study to bring out the head voice.

Good reading is the foundation of good speaking; and attention to the elements of good reading is, therefore, of the utmost consequence. The first requisite is attention to proper inflexions of voice—the rising and falling. He lately heard a preacher reading from the sermon on the Mount, regardless of the inflexions, and in reading Matt. v. 15, he let his voice fall at candle, making the first member of the verse an assertion—thus,—'Neither do men light a candle.' A similar illustration of this error was given by a gentleman when reading Cowper's poem on slavery, giving this rendering; 'Man finds his fellow guilty of a skin.' Terrible crime! 'Man finds his fellow guilty of a skin not colored like his own, &c.' Many illustrations from Richard III. were introduced;—'Is the chair empty, &c.' 'Was ever woman in this humor wooed, &c.' Cowper to his mother's picture;—'O that those lips had language!' 'How mysterious are the ways of God?' Chatham in his celebrated speech in reference to the American war,—'If I were an American I would not lay down my arms—Never! NEVER! never.' The sense of an author very much depends on the management of the rising and falling inflexions of the voice. Without this, assertions may become questions, and irony approbation.

2. Emphasis. The meaning of sentences depends oftentime entirely upon the management of the emphasis. For instance Chatham in his speech says;—'Can ministers presume still to expect support in their infatuation?' Whatever word is emphasized in this sentence, makes a certain idea prominent. So also, Jesus to Judas;—'Betrayest thou the Son of Man with a kiss?' Betrayest? thou? the Son of Man? with a kiss? One simple rule can be adopted which is sufficient to enable a person to manage the emphasis even when reading a passage for the first time; it is this;—Every word that stands for a new idea should be emphatic. The 'Lord sent Nathan unto David.' Take Byron's description of the ball given by the Dutchess of Saint Albans the night before the battle of Waterloo. The whole poem is one of the finest exercises for trying the emphasis according to this rule, so many and so rapid are the transitions of ideas.

3. Climax. Climax comes from the Greek word signifying ladder. It is a shooting up of ideas. Every member of a climax should be emphatic sometimes; and yet there is generally in these cases some one idea more prominent than the rest, and to the sign of which a prominence of emphasis should be given. St. Peter gives a good example,—'Add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, &c.' 2 Peter i. 5-7. In Othello's Apology for his marriage, is a fine exercise—'What drugs, &c.' Running up a climax is one of the best exercises for the voice. Take a passage from Byron's poem alluded to—a climax of seven members;—'And nearer, &c.' Or the close of one of Phillips' speeches;—'Oh, I need not ask this verdict from your mercy; I need not extort it from your compassion; I will receive it from your justice. I do conjure you, not as fathers, but as husbands;—not as husbands, but as citizens;—not as citizens, but as men;—not as men, but as christians;—by all your obligations, public, private, moral, and religious; by the hearth profaned; by the home desolated; by the canons of the living God foully spurned—save, oh! save your firesides from the contagion, your country from the crime, and perhaps thousands yet unborn, from the shame, and sin, and sorrow of this example.'

This splendid passage by being read without a regard to the climaxes, becomes monotonous as the continual striking on one key of a piano forte. 'The Oxford Student and his father's servant, or Breaking Bad News,' is a fine example of the climax. So is the whole of Othello's Apology for his marriage. This last extract affords also a good exercise to attend to all the rules given. So also does Patrick Henry's speech in favor of the War, with which the lecture was closed.

BOOK OF CREATION.

THIS state of being may be regarded as a priming to another life. None of our desires are fully satisfied here. The eye fails before the splendor of beauty, and even the mind has experienced fruition. We are pleased with the brightness of the sun; yet we cannot gaze upon him. The brain is wearied in the search for knowledge, while exhaustless stores are still left uncultured. The fables of man have rendered death hideous, and bad economy has changed its very nature, so that that which was intended to be but the gradual wearing out of this earthly frame—the slow sinking of the light of existence in the socket—is converted into a sudden shock, full of pain and unnecessary terror. Were the art of living understood, were intemperance avoided, and exercise pursued—‘the age of a man would be as the age of a tree,’ and his decay would be equally gradual, without suffering and without fear. The gluttony of man, the sudden changes from heated rooms to damp atmospheres, the abundance of useless clothing which pride and vanity have invented—all these prepare us and our descendants for sudden illness and for visionary fears, nameless apprehensions, and short lives unnaturally wrested.

Nearly all the sorrow we experience in this life, is the result of our own disobedience to the laws of nature, and it is worthy of note that we who are punished in our bodies are those individuals upon whom the light of civilization has dawned. It is the man who has the knowledge of the law who suffers from its infraction. We know that the lives we lead are unnatural; we know that our sedentary habits, our sealed rooms, and our excessive indulgence of the palate, are not healthful, and that we shall suffer for it. But the barbarous nations know nothing of the science of living, and having no law, they do not suffer from the infraction of law. The barbarian has no bad dreams—no tormenting fears; he never suffers from indigestion, lassitude, or the many diseases to which civilized people are subject.

This world, therefore, was intended as a place of enjoyment; its enjoyments may be comparatively coarse—but when reason is permitted to have her perfect work, we shall find that they point to a better state, to an exceeding weight of glory, yet to be revealed, when the veil of flesh is removed. Although we suffer much from disobedience to the laws of nature, yet even here the benignity of God is displayed; since our evils are often turned to good, as the fairest flowers spring up from the unseemly soil. Although good may come forth from evil, like honey from the lion's carcase, yet it is always better to escape evil. By our sins against the law of nature, our torments are increased. Some individual who has broken down his spirits by indulgence in sensuality, goes forth to publish his own fears and apprehensions. Now, people more readily sympathize with sorrow than with joy. Fear is always an epidemic. Let a person, sitting at his fireside, hear a number of individuals laughing joyfully in the street, and it will scarcely attract his attention—but let him hear them uttering exclamations of terror, and he will start upon his feet scarcely less agitated than they are, even before he knows the cause of their fear. When Jesus appeared to his disciples, risen from the dead, we are told that they ‘believed not for joy’; but if they had been told that the Sanhedrim had pronounced sentence of death against themselves, they would soon have given evidence that they believed. There is a common saying upon the reception of joyful news—‘It is too good news to be true!’ This saying eloquently portrays the characteristic of the human mind. We like to be on the safe side. If bad news proves true, we shall experience no disappointment, if we have believed the report. We often hear people say: ‘If the Universalists are correct, then we shall lose nothing by a belief in partialism; but if the former should prove untrue, we should be damned for our heresy, if we believed in it!’ The fact that partialism appeals for support to so base an argument, does little honor to its supporters.

As soon as our fears are excited in respect to the mysterious and the unknown, they operate more powerfully than hope. The reason of this is, that one of the uses of that passion develops itself in guarding man against rashness. Fear prevents a man from leaping in the dark; it serves to caution us against trusting one who is utterly unknown to us, and who might deceive us. But when we permit it to operate towards God and his designs, we do wickedly. There is no excuse for mankind, if they do not repose full confidence in the mercy of God: or, if there is any excuse those only can plead it who have been misled and blinded by tradition and education—by that hideous and blasphemous creed which represents the benign Author of our being as the inventor of future punishment. The goodness of God is legibly written on every part of the Universe, and no book whatever can be of greater authority than the book of Nature. Other books are written by human hands, and have been preserved by mortal agency: but here are unrolled to us those everlasting pages upon which the very Finger of God has written his purposes towards us, in characters so legible that the fool may read and understand. The record of everlasting mercy is hung up before our sight, and the broad sun pours his beams upon the lettering. He who cannot read the ever-enduring benignity of God here, in vain calls for the testimony of the dead. Are we not, then, justly punished, if we overlook the plain record which God has given us in his creation, and listen to the ravings of men, whose interest it is to magnify their office by pretending to be the keepers of heaven's gate—the almoners of the Universal God? Is the butterfly less under the protection of God—does the chrysalis go less safely through his glorious change, because he has never blundered among Greek and Hebrew? Is the sheep's coat less warm, because no one has informed him that all the earth has been cursed for man's sake? Does the fish, sporting in the silvery lake, need to know that a flood of waters once covered the mountains? He rejoices in the life which God has given him, and if he could express his feelings, he would declare the glory of his Creator. All creation teems with enjoyment; and the more we study nature, the more we shall discover of the contrivances of God to promote the happiness of his creatures. We need, therefore, to go no farther to insure ourselves that whatever is our future state of being, it must be attended with more happiness than misery. Nay—the law of existence is improvement; and that we shall advance still higher in the scale of being, and find more happiness in futurity than we can possibly realize here, is the natural conclusion to which we must arrive.

It requires a long time to remove the impression of fear. Fear is the protector of men and animals, and was mercifully bestowed upon us to guard our bodies from pain and death: but when men saddle upon the fears of others those things which belong not to them, they create unnecessary suffering. Designing people have always found fear the most potent auxiliary which they could bring to bear against the liberties of others. In ages of darkness, the ambitious leaders of the people were like ignorant mothers and nurses who rule their children by exciting their fears. Horrid and cruel policy! A lady of strong mind and excellent education, residing in the city of New York, told me that she was perfectly satisfied that there were no such things as ghosts and hobgoblins, but she had been instructed in such things during her childhood—'and now,' said she—'if I am alone in the dark, I feel and act precisely as if I did believe in them. I cannot get over the impression which those stories left upon my mind.'

When I was a lad, there was a dark nook in the mason-work of the cellar. The serving maids told me that a big black man occupied the place: and it so wrought upon my fears that I was unwilling to go into the cellar alone, even in the day time. My father perceiving this, lighted a lamp, and carried me into the place. He showed me every part of the nook, and there was nothing in it. Instead of being convinced by this ocular demonstration, I looked up to my father and said—'When will the big black man come back?' I supposed that he had merely fled at our approach, and would return to his den. Nothing could dissipate my fears of the spot, and believed what had been told me, in preference to what my own eyes had seen! So it is with those who believe in future punishment. They think that because God is powerful, he must necessarily be cruel. In all nursery tales of giants, they are represented as monsters of cruelty. The ancients were mere children in science and demonstrative knowledge: and they supposed that the power to govern without responsibility was necessarily connected with the will to play the despot.

Men who love to be feared by their children and helpless dependants cannot conceive of a God without tyranny and revenge. The pure in heart, only, can see the Supreme Benefactor in his true colors. Every person who lives upon the earth will be happier, in a future state of being than he can possibly be in this.

Now, reader, are you prepared to trust the Word of God revealed in the creation and in your own heart? Nothing but this is wanting to render us contented with our destiny and full of hope for the future. It is the fear to trust ourselves to the disposal of God—a doubt of his benignity that occasions nearly all our woes—our incertitudes—our griefs—our tormenting fears. Wear this on thy heart, on thy mind, deeply engraven, and ever legible: 'I will fear nothing that can happen to me, for the Author of all good, is the Author of my destiny!'

SONNETS.

BY CHARLOTTE.

THE BRIDE.

SHE stands before the altar, bright with blushes,
Trembling with fear, of keenest pleasure born;
And ah! how tenderly the lover hushes
The agitation of the timid fawn.
Her radiant eyes thro' jetty fringes beaming,
Rival the midnight blackness of her hair;
In which a few soft, orient pearls are gleaming,
As if to show the brow and neck more fair.
But listen now! the willing hand is given—
The vow is said—the solemn rites are done—
The tie that only may by death be riven,
Is consecrated—and the twain are one!
God bless thee, beautiful and happy bride—
And lead thee safely in the path untried!

THE BURIAL.

THROUGH the church-yard a solemn train is sweeping,
Clad in the sable draperies of grief;
Their forms are bowed, their eyes are red with weeping,
For one whose term of life was all too brief!
In vain they strive their mournful sobs to smother,
Whene'er they think of her, the young and gay,
One year a wife—one little week a mother,
So early called from all she loved away!
Then comes that 'withering sound' to all who love her,
The clods are falling on the coffin-lid!
And now they heap the flowery sods above her,
And the beloved one is forever hid!
Mourner! behold the rainbow in the skies—
She whom thou lovest shall again arise!

GOD'S ALTAR.

Not where the organ-tones are loudly pealing
Thro' the cathedral aisles or arches dim—
Nor when upon the ear is softly stealing,
The low, sweet cadence of the evening hymn—
Not where the sound of pompous prayer ascendeth,
And hundred voices echo it again—
Not where the knee in solemn mockery bendeth,
And careless lips pronounce a loud AMEN!
Not where the sacramental cup o'erflowing
Presents a symbol of the Savior's blood—
But in the HEART with pure affection glowing,
Is the true altar of the living God!
There hath he reared his own most holy shrine,
And consecrated it with Love Divine!

THE STARS.

'Those golden tears that men call stars.'—HYPERION.

BEAUTIFUL thought! that the stars o'erhead
Which beam so soft on our mortal ken,
Are but the tears which the angels shed
O'er the transgressions of sinful men!
Though changeless ye seem to our feeble sight,
With steady brilliancy shining on—
Do ye not beam with a holier light
To hail the return of the erring one?
Golden drops from compassion's fount,
Lit by the fire on Mercy's shrine—
When the hosts of the ransomed upward mount,
To bask in the glories of Love divine—
Shall ye not blaze like undying suns,
In the golden crowns of the shining ones?—

MARY, MOTHER OF CHRIST.

MOTHER of Christ! what dream of fame
Could paint a lot so high as thine?
How meanly sounds earth's proudest name
Beside a title so divine!
In every nation, age and clime
Where HIS religion has been taught,
Thy name has been with thoughts sublime,
With holy love and sweetness fraught!
O who was honored e'er like thee—
What heart was e'er so sorely tried?
Raised from thy lowly lot to be
The mother of the Crucified!
Hail highly favored! who upon thy breast,
Didst lull the infant SON OF GOD to rest!

THE CRUCIFIXION.

A WAIL of woe is heard from Calvary's mountain—
A mournful cry resounds along the plain!
Forth pours the stream from Love's redeeming fountain,
The SON OF GOD—th' anointed one is slain!
And lo! the air is rent with peals of thunder,
And midnight darkness on the city lies;
The mountains shake—the rocks are torn asunder—
The graves are opened—and the dead arise!
Priest, Judge and Levite see the awful vision,
And to the ground fall prostrate with affright;

Rejoice, O man! thy sins have found remission,
And 'immortality is brought to light!'
Christ hath fulfilled his Heaven-appointed mission,
And Love's bright banner streams from Calvary's height!

THE ISLE OF THE GIFTED.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

'BEAUTIFUL, O how beautiful!' was my exclamation as I finished reading an article from the pen of one of our most gifted female writers, and truly indeed did it merit the encomium. The subject embraced one of her most favorite themes, and in language the most glowing and harmonious, she had embodied sentiments which could not but awaken the most thrilling and ecstatic emotions. So vivid were her descriptions, and so clear the expression of her thoughts, that with her, I seemed to have entered the blissful courts of immortality, and witnessed the reunion of friends long since separated on earth—the reveller in sin turn in penitence to the paternal mansion, and the father, when he was yet afar off, stretch forth his arms to embrace the erring but repentant one, while angels of the celestial choir struck their harps to greet him with a joyful welcome.

And such is the power of language! So wholly absorbed had been my attention, and so deeply interested were my sympathies, that I was conscious of my own existence, only at times when the blood seemed to stop in my veins as if to prolong a throb of delight, and at the next instant to hurry forward with such rapidity, that each nerve was thrilled with unutterable sensations. But the subject was concluded; too soon I thought, and from that lofty height to which my imagination had been conducted, I descended to plain reality, and was now only permitted to regard with admiration the skill of one who had been so successful in chaining my attention and leading my fancy at will. Happy, superlatively happy! thought I, must she be, who feels conscious of such a power, and closing the book, I leaned my head forward upon the table, and in the depth of earnestness whispered, 'O would that I too were gifted!'

Again and again was the wish silently repeated, though as fervently as before, and again did I muse on the pleasure and satisfaction which must attend the gifted. I would not care so much that the world knew of my possession, but I would that deep in my heart, I might feel conscious of a power to elicit that world's admiration! Neither would I, that the choice and faithful few who knew that I was thus blessed, should tell me I was gifted, and yet I would that one—one whose commendation I prized above all others, should whisper in my ear his knowledge of its truth! But if this wish might not be gratified, I would that I might be permitted to live in the light of the example, and listen forever to the conversation of those so much more favored than the common lot of mortals; for surely thought I, those who sing so sweetly of the virtues, can but know what a blessed thing it is to practise them—those who can awaken such pleasure with the silent pen, can but dispense from their lips the honeyed words of delight.

As these thoughts passed, a more confused train followed, and in a few moments more, sleep and its dreamy attendants were with me. But still was the theme unchanged, and with a fervor equalling that which was at first felt, I again repeated, O would that I too were gifted! Scarcely had the words died away, when a hand was laid upon my shoulder, and I was surprised to see a stranger by my side. For a moment he remained silent, while I gazed with the deepest admiration upon beauty as singular as it was unrivalled. It did not consist so much in regularity of features, and beauty of complexion, as in the glance of a soul-lit eye, which spoke more than volumes, and the expression of a mouth which seemed to have forever drank in wisdom. 'Twas Genius; and with eagerness I listened to what he might say. 'I have heard your wish,' said he, 'and have come hither to ask if you know its whole import. True the sphere of those whom you so revere, is a lofty and admired one, but know you not that attendant on it are trials and difficulties, vexations, disappointments and heart-aches, which those in other stations know not of. Besides, are not the most delicate flowers the more easily blighted, is not the finest texture the more susceptible of injury, and do not the loveliest tints of the rainbow the soonest fade? Even thus with the gifted. With talents they are also possessed of cultivated sympathies and refined feelings, and like the delicate flower, and fine of texture, they sink beneath the gentlest breath of suspicion, and their hearts are torn in anguish by a touch which would be unheeded by others; and as the loveliest hues of the rainbow the soonest fade, so do they pass from the earth ere the world has half learned to admire their beauties! And would you wish to be numbered with them?'

Before I had time to answer, another of noble mien and lofty bearing approached, and though clad in richest robes, and adorned with glittering gems, he seemed on terms of familiarity and friendship with Genius, all unadorned and lowly as he appeared. Though I did not remember of ever having seen him before, yet his spell was on my heart, and he seemed a familiar acquaintance. 'Twas Ambition, and turning from Genius he saluted me in the most bland and courteous manner. 'I too, have heard your wish,' said he, 'and claim your hearing; Genius has told you that difficulties and dangers beset the gifted, but have they not joys and delights peculiar only to themselves, which overbalance these? He has told you that the delicate flower is easily blighted, but does it not retain its fragrance, ay is not its perfume increased long after its petals have withered? He has pointed you to the more beautiful tints of the rainbow—and it may be that they are soonest to fade, but say, are not their memories cherished and their beauties treasured up in the heart long, long after the latest that lingered have been forgotten?'

In glowing language he then painted the Isle where dwelt the gifted, and offered his guidance and the aid of Genius to conduct me thither. His representation enkindled anew the desire which had been partly suppressed by the language of my earlier visiter, and expressing a thankful acceptance of what he had tendered, I turned to Genius for his confirmation. It was given, and taking the arm which he proffered, we followed Ambition till we came to the shore of a bright and beautiful lake, whose silvery waters rose and fell, like drapery stirred by an infant's breathing. Casting my eye over its beautiful expanse, I saw far in its centre, an elevated Isle, and upon asking Ambition if it were the one he had mentioned, he raised to my eye a small golden cased telescope, which had till now, hung unobserved by his side. Still was the Isle too far away to be closely observed, yet in the distance it appeared lovely almost beyond description. The richest verdure like the softest velvet, was spread over its rounded surface, while it seemed that all the most effulgent of the sun's rays had combined to shower upon it a golden smile. Trees of the loftiest and most beautiful proportions, clothed in leaves of brightest green, were scattered throughout the Isle, and I felt sure that beneath their shade must bloom the sweetest flowers.

But I could linger no longer, and forgetting that 'tis distance lends enchantment to the view,' I stepped into the barge which slept at our feet, and begged Genius to hasten to the lovely Isle. He took a light oar in either hand, and Ambition stationing himself at the helm to direct its course, the barge glided swiftly over the sky-dyed waters, while dimples, which nestled in their bosoms the reflection of a fleecy cloud, followed in its wake. As we proceeded, musical notes came wafted over the lake, and as they fell on the ear, my heart in ecstasies beat time. 'Twas the voice of praise, and sweet, sweet indeed were the notes to me, but instead of satisfying they but awakened a desire to hear more, and seating myself by the side of Genius, I endeavored to hasten our progress, for Ambition said, that when we should arrive, I should be forever greeted with her strains. Our boat was soon moored, but still was the labor no more than half accomplished. The elevation was not very great, but extremely difficult for ascension; besides attendant on every step was the danger of falling back into the waters of the lake, in which case I should be forever forgotten, or remembered only by the few who watched my progress. But Genius remained by my side lending a helping hand, and removing whatever obstacles could not be overcome, while Ambition flew rapidly up the height, keeping forever beyond reach and aiding me only by encouragement.

At length weary and toil-worn, I gained the elevation, and was surprised to see deep ravines, hedges of thorns, with briars and brambles, scattered throughout what was otherwise a garden of beauty; though one of far less loveliness than I had imagined. The number too, of the dwellers on the Isle was far greater than I had supposed—indeed the names of but a comparative few of the numerous assemblage, had ever reached my ear, but the pallid features and languid movements of all, showed that they had toiled to gain the ascent, and had still to struggle to overcome the obstacles which impeded their progress. Around the brow of each was entwined a wreath of laurel, to testify that as a recompense for all these toils and struggles, the world had bestowed a tribute of admiration. Ill measured recompense! I might have thought at another time, but Ambition was still beckoning me forward with his smiles and allurements, and so, thoughtless of all else and unmindful of my present fatigue, I again availed myself of the aid of Genius, and mingled with the crowd. A continual restlessness and uneasy anxiety marked the actions of the greater number, but even while laboring to surmount the greatest difficulties, an expression like an emotion of pleasure, beamed from their eyes, and this I thought was the only evidence of true enjoyment, but it appeared that it was not their incentive, for when the voice of commendation and applause reached their ears, they redoubled their exertions, and pressed forward with renewed zeal.

Approaching one whose name was familiar, and whose productions were well worthy of praise, I was induced to ask her opinion of the article with which I had been so much pleased. 'To tell you the truth,' said she, in a voice lowered as if to denote confidence, 'I never did admire that author's prose articles—her figures are too far fetched, her imagery is allowable only in poetry, and there is a tinsel splendor thrown over the whole of her writings which renders them disgusting to a refined and cultivated taste.'

Surprised at such a decision, I raised my eyes to her face and was no less astonished, at the change it had undergone. A dark frown sat where before beamed a radiant smile, and the bright look of intelligence which radiated from eyes that seemed full of gentleness, was changed to a glance of suspicion from beneath lids which shut in hatred. I thought too that her laurels began to wither; and unwilling to listen longer to one whose criticisms were the product of envy, rather than real discernment, I turned away. 'Misjudging and miserable creature!' said Genius as we left her, 'she fears that the lustre of her own talents will become dimmed by a reflection from the brightness of another's, and thus the purity of enjoyment which my gifts would otherwise confer, are lost to her.'

I was about to make some further inquiry respecting her, when Genius interrupted it, by pointing to a young female who was seated on a grassy mound, at a little distance. She was regarding with evident pleasure and satisfaction a page of a popular periodical, while at the close of every short interval she raised her hand to her head as if endeavoring to adjust, in the most pleasing manner, the few bright leaves which fell over her young and snowy brow. Drawing near, I recognised her as the author of several sweet and touching lays, and addressing her, she returned our salutation with an easy grace and winning smile, and reached to us the open pamphlet. Casting my eye on the page which had arrested her attention, I saw near the foot, a short note, in which she was spoken of as a young though gifted and accomplished writer, whose poetry was full of pathos, and whose descriptions were full of life. I was somewhat surprised at her forwardness, but before I had time to frame a reply, (for it was plain that she expected one,) Genius led me back, remarking—'Hers are rich gifts and rare, but she has not yet learned, to hide her vanity.'

Passing on, we saw on the right, a tall, intelligent looking gentleman, busily engaged in looking over a new and highly lauded poem. Being anxious to obtain the opinion of one so well qualified to judge as he appeared to be, I advanced to his side, and asked what he thought of the production. 'It rhymes well enough,' said he, 'but,' he continued with a sneer, 'all rhyme is not poetry, and the greater shame is, the world has not sense enough to know it!' Saying this, he turned on his heel and walked away, but I observed that he appeared of less noble stature than before; and that he placed his hand to his head to see if his new rival had not plucked some of his hard earned laurels. As he left us, a small group who were engaged in discussing the merits of some particular author approached, and I heard one remark, 'Yes, he writes very well—particularly when he writes of himself! Do you not observe how largely he figures in all his productions?'

Musing on all that had passed, I took the arm of Genius and walked on in silence. I did not feel any longer a desire for the laurel crown, and Ambition was no longer near to beckon us onward in the way of difficulties, so Genius led me forward in a smoother path. But we had not proceeded far, when two gentlemen crossed our way, and to a remark which one made, the other replied—'She has talents,—their is no doubt of that, but it is a pity she does not employ them about something better than frivolous love-stories.' Observing that Genius had noticed the last remark and emboldened by repeated examples, I asked him why all those upon whom he had bestowed his gifts were so unwilling to acknowledge that others were as highly favored as themselves, or when compelled to admit this, why they were so unwilling to allow that the gifts of others were improved in a proper manner?

'Nay, it is not thus,' said Genius. 'Do you not remember that it was Ambition who guided you hither, and are not all of those whom you have noticed, his followers? Many there are, upon whom I have showered the choicest and richest of my stores, who appreciate all that is bright and beautiful in science, and all that is pure and lovely in morality, and they are willing to encourage and credit to the full, all the merits of others. But they are those who have chosen the quiet retreats of duty and usefulness, rather than the ostentation which you so ardently wished to possess—they are those who have never bowed for the adulation of the world, or sought to win the smile of fame—they are those, who have never been lured away by the wiles of Ambition or suffered their spirits to be clothed with the garments of vanity or envy!'

'What!' said I, 'would you that your brightest gems should be treasured up in the casket of the mind, and hid forever from the sight of all except their possessors?'

'No: I would that they should improve, polish them, but that they should let the reflection of their brightness, go forth only for the cause of virtue and humanity—yea, I would that their possessors should shine forth like stars in the cloudless heavens, but like them send forth their beams, not so much for their own glory, as to enlighten the darkened understandings, and enkindle the fire of devotion in the hearts of all upon whom their rays should fall. Then instead of wishing to strike from existence the myriads by which they are surrounded, they would greet with joy, and hail with gladness, each new accession to their ranks, and each new brilliant in their firmament!'

Just as he finished speaking, a noise which shook the place whereon we stood, alarmed me, and looking down I found that I had let fall the book, and lo! all that had passed was a dream. But it had its moral and induced the determination that though still striving to obtain wisdom and understanding, I would never aspire to a high place in the ranks of those called gifted, and that in examining the productions of others, if there was found in them any thing which was calculated to instruct or afford innocent amusement to any class of mankind, and nothing to deteriorate the cause of virtue and humanity, I would commend them, though they were highly faulty in the less important particulars of style, perspicuity, or construction.

TO A MOURNER.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

IN memory of REBECCA P. CONNER, who died suddenly January 18th, 1843, at the age of eighteen.

'Blessed are they that mourn; for they shall be comforted.'

THOU weepest for a sister! in the bloom
And spring-time of her years to death a prey;
Shrouded from love by the remorseless tomb;
Taken from all life's joys and griefs away.
'Tis hard to part with one so sudden called,
So young, so happy, and so dearly loved;
To see the arrow at our idol hurled,
And vainly pray the shaft may be removed.

Young, loving, and beloved! O, cruel death!
Couldst thou not spare the treasure for awhile?
There are worn hearts that wait to yield their breath,
And aged eyes that can no longer smile.
Why pass the weary pilgrims on their way,
Bowed down with toil and sighing for relief,
To make the blossom in its pride thy prey
Whose joyous heart had never tasted grief?

Weeper! thou hast a treasure for thine eyes,
In the fair semblance of the sainted dead: *
See the sweet smiling face before thee rise,
From which the light of life so lately fled:
See the same bright expression beaming there;
The mild blue eyes and pleasant features trace,
And the brown ringlets of her floating hair,
Shading the fresh cheek with their wavy grace.

Sad sister, turn not hopelessly away,
Nor longer at the will of Heaven repine:
Fold not thy hands in agony and say
'There is no sorrow in the world like mine.'
O, could my numbers soothe thy sinking soul;
Or one hope waken with the words I twine;
Soft sounds of sympathy around should roll,
Warm from a heart that knows such pain as thine.

I, too, have been a mourner. Sorrow deep
Its lava tide around my pathway rolled,
And sable weeds a hue could never keep
Sad as the heart they hid beneath their fold.
All joy grew dim before my tearful eye,
Which but the shadow of the grave could see;
There was no brightness in the earth or sky;
There was no sunshine in the world for me.

Oh! bitter was the draught from sorrow's cup,
And stern the anguish which my spirit wrung,
When I was called to give my idol up,
And bend a mourner o'er the loved and young.
And for the lost to weep is still my choice;
I ask for one whose pilgrimage is o'er,
And vainly listen for a vanished voice,
Whose pleasant tones shall greet my ear no more.

There is a spell around my spirit cast;
A shadow where the sunbeam smiled before;

* A perfect likeness painted by I. B. Flagg.

'Tis grief, but all its bitterness is past;
 'Tis sorrow, but its murmurings are o'er,
 Within my soul, which to the storm was bowed,
 Now the white wing of peace is folded deep,
 And I have found, I trust, behind the cloud,
 The blessing promised to the eyes that weep.

So thou wilt find relief. For deepest wo
 A fount of healing in our pathway springs;
 Like Lethe's stream that silver fountain's flow
 A soothing draught unto the sufferer brings.
 A Father chastened thee! O, look to Him!
 And his dear love in all thy trials see;
 Look with the eye of faith through shadows dim,
 And He will send 'the Comforter' to thee.

GOSSIPINGS OF IDLE HOURS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

HOOR ELEVENTH.

WELL, dear Lottie, I am in a merry mood once more—and who would not be, at the sight of that laughing blue eye, peeping out from its bonnet of straw? And such a day, too! Why Lottie, a very mule might be pardoned for a frisk or two in a sunshine so exhilarating.

Will you go a bird's-nesting? Not a foraging the poor dear things, but just to take a peep at the tiny blue eggs, or drop a few crumbs into the gaping mouths of the fledglings. No, I see you have your heart set upon a dinner of minims and chubs. But what will you do for fishing-tackle? Here is my work-box—help yourself to pins and thread—and down by the brookside we can find an abundance of willow-rods. You laugh, but I assure you it is all the angling apparatus I ever use.

Pray don't stay inhaling the very life out of those poor violets, if it is three long years since one has met your eye. I am impatient to show you my gipsying haunts. There! isn't this the coziest bit of an island you ever saw? And look above! What a wealth of clematis has hung itself upon every bough of this young elm. Do you think the whole islet is broad enough for us to sit upon? Let us try.

Are you a Mesmerizer? One would suspect so from the intensity with which you have been gazing at that poor dragon-fly for these last ten minutes. His violet-colored body may possess some magnetic properties, for aught I know—and look at his eyes! Those round, staring, motionless orbs, are, for all the world, a perfect miniature of Dr. O.'s, who has so much of the nervo-fluid, it is thought he might put the aurora-borealis to sleep, were he to gaze at it.

'Oh my!' as our friend Mr. T. says—'what a shoal of the tiniest little fish! Do see them, how they dart away at the sound of my voice, and hide themselves in the shadow of those grape leaves. When they passed through that streak of sunshine, they looked like so many amphibious jewels, 'gone in a-swimming.' Oh Lottie! what a sin it would be to eat such pretty creatures as those. Of how many hours of fine frolic in these little spearmint scented nooks and coves we should thus deprive them—we, who, ourselves, love frolic so well! And all to gratify a momentary whim of appetite. I acknowledge there is a mystery about this principle of life which consecrates, and makes it sacred in my eyes. It is what we all can take away, but none of us can restore; and it is not without hesitation that I destroy the life of a troublesome and insignificant insect. Why should I deprive it of an existence given to it by God—and given, we may well believe, for purposes of use and enjoyment? If He deemed it worthy of creation, ought not I, at least, to regard it as deserving preservation?

Oh what a bright little cluster of cowslips! Do you like them, dear? They are becoming to your dark locks—let me interweave them. Mary says they are a coarse looking flower, and from having frequently seen them brought upon the table as an edible, they are not altogether poetically associated in the mind with salt pork and beef. Despite this misfortune, however, they are rather a favorite flower; and I never see their golden clusters and rich green leaves growing upon the water's brink, without feeling a fresh glow overspread my innermost heart.

Look—do look! See that green-coated, amphibious gentleman, with his hand resting gracefully upon that mossy stone, and his legs dangling in the water. He is the troubadour, I take it, who gives us our nightly serenades. Pray, my dear Sir Frog, don't fix those bright eyes of yours so insinuatingly upon my friend Lottie. She loves your serenades much better than she loves you. But what can the fellow mean, hanging so long upon that stone, gazing at us poor unoffending demoiselles? You know he was Galvani's first subject—who knows but what his regard for science has induced him to offer himself as a subject for Mesmeric experiments? Try him, Lottie.

No—he is no martyr. Away he paddles down the bright current, till finally he is lost to our eyes. Farewell, gallant troubadour; your music will be welcome in our hours of slumber, but Lottie and I regard you as de trop in our sylvan tete a tete.

While you are braiding that wreath of violets, I will read you a little hymn I wrote this morning, to be sung in the tune—'Near the lake, where droops the willow.'

Lord of midnight and of morning,
 Hail, hail to Thee!
 Now the golden light is dawning
 O'er rill and tree.

Soft the dew rests on the roses,
 Fragrant the air;

Every flower some sweet discloses,
Balmy and rare.

Nature worships at her altars—
So, too, should we;
Base, indeed, the heart that falters
In loving Thee.

Lord of Love, send down thy blessing
On us, below;
Let each heart, its wants confessing,
With fervor glow.

None so good as Thou, Jehovah!
Be Thou obeyed;
For thy mercy spreadeth over
All Thou hast made!

E'en the humblest, lowliest creature,
Lives by thy care;
Why should we, of human nature,
E'er then, despair?

Hark! can that be the dinner bell—so soon? Oh Lottie! where are your minims? If the good keepers-at-home have not been more provident than we wild gadders-abroad, I fear me we must be content to make our repast of cowslips and water cresses.

PHENOMENA OF THE HEAVENS.

BY HENRY BACON.

PSALM xix. 1: 'The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handy work.'

THE first impression made on the mind by reading these words, is to recall the pleasurable emotions with which we contemplate the heavens when the stars are unveiled, or when the moon walks in brightness. No feeling is more universal than this. It proves directly and eloquently, that the Creator has constituted man to be lifted up by elevating thought—that he has given to all a love of the sublime, which can be made to minister to the highest good of the soul. And is it not a cause for deep and fervent gratitude, that we are so constituted as to derive rich enjoyment from the scenery of the heavens, to acknowledge the beauty and magnificence of the stars, and to bathe our very souls in the flood of moonlight as in a sea of glory! Were it not for this constitution of our being, how much would be taken from the sum of yearly happiness! We can in some degree imagine the effect of the withdrawal of this feeling after the sublime, by asking ourselves, For what would we part with the impulses that impel us so often to exclaim, How beautiful is Night! No more to find beauty in the heavens! No more to welcome the stars! No more to rejoice when the sunset hues have faded, and millions of suns shine where one late shone! No more to be lifted up by the grandeur of night, or to yield ourselves to the mysterious influence of the silent hours! No more to know a desire to rise and put aside the curtain, or to leave the couch of sleeplessness, and gaze as on the inner veil of Paradise, drinking in new life from the display of immensity and glory!

O who would cease to love the stars—to throw away the dear remembrance of youthful impressions, when we strove to count the glittering points and felt a sweet awe creeping over the soul as we gazed and gazed and had no desire to give ourselves to sleep! The world has indeed dealt treacherously with us in stealing away by its perplexing and wearying cares the delights of youth's innocent time. It has taken from us the undefined pleasures of unenlightened admiration of the heavens, and has given us nothing to replace them. It should not be so. The right culture of the intellect in harmony with the moral sentiments, can always supply compensations for any loss of the delightful mystic feelings of childhood. If we cannot bring back the heaven that was above us then, we can make the heavens that are now above us to declare God's glory; and whatever exhibits his glory, affords nutriment to feed and satisfy the soul's desire for happiness.

If the heavens did declare God's glory to us in childhood, we ought not to be satisfied with that. We should ask after something more than a poetical feeling, something higher than unenlightened admiration. The heavens should show God's handy-work—the work of his wisdom, power and goodness. We should enter, as we are able, into an acquaintance with the laws which govern the motions and revolutions of the heavenly bodies and their stupendous magnitude; for it is only thus that our admiration of the celestial scenery, can be made to differ from that awakened in the breast of the savage, as he sits on some lone rock which overlooks the sea, gazing on the heavens above and the mirror beneath. Suppose Newton standing beside him: What a difference in the expression of their countenances, eloquently illustrative of the difference of soul—of enlightened and ignorant contemplation. Suppose the savage capable of reading the nineteenth Psalm. How different were its sublimity to him, in comparison with its effects on Newton's mind! How different the thoughts awakened, the ideas suggested, and the visions of magnificent creations spread before the eye of the imagination! As different as the fancies and vagaries of Astrology, from the mighty and everlasting truths of Astronomy, As different as the studies of Chaldean shepherds, from the researches of true scientific philosophers.

And does not this show the Theology of Science? Does it not prove to us that knowledge is essential to elevated and worthy views of God's works? Does it not clearly certify that the christian has something to do with science and philosophy, and that the word of God is made more eloquent by the study of his works?

Indeed, his works are his word—they express the divine mind—they bring us into intercourse with the Invisible Spirit. Christians are too apt to forget this, and hence they build the glory of the Bible upon the ruin of the chief beauty of nature. The chief beauty of nature, I say, because as a most lovely human body is but as an exquisite statue, when the soul has departed—when the spirit no longer expresses itself through the material, so is nature when the Deity gives no expression of himself through his works. The child who has never seen his parent, can be made to know that parent through the works wrought for his happiness and improvement, in the arrangements for his education; and so is it with man and a knowledge of God. When the child becomes able to read a letter from his parent, he will doubtless joy in the privilege; he will be thankful for this more direct communication with unseen love, and he will study the pages with care and diligence. But it would be decidedly wrong for him to turn away from considering the works of the parent—from an intelligent appreciation of those tokens of parental love.

It is thus that the religious duty of obtaining knowledge is established. It is thus that increase in scientific wisdom may become communion with God, may enlarge the mind, may render man capable of receiving more and a higher happiness, and thus be made a guardian of innocence, a preserver of virtue, by imparting an excitement in harmony with the healthy action of the superior laws of our being.

And especially do we see the religious obligation of seeking after knowledge and with all our gettings to get understanding, in a day like this when some of the shadows of the dark ages seem to have lengthened unto the present time. The heavens are now gazed upon, not studied, by many, not to understand how they declare God's glory, how they show his handy work, but to gather phenomena to startle and keep alive the fears of the ignorant and superstitious. They look on the firmament as boys out of an enclosure watch to see some fanciful fireworks, not knowing the preparatory arrangements, and ignorant that the whole and every part is governed by strict laws. Hence lighted lamps raised from the tops of the highest trees, have been mistaken for stars; and many a rocket has made a most excellent comet. So also, when in the revolutions of celestial bodies, a comet really returns, there are to them 'signs in the heavens,' but not a body governed by strict laws. In comparison with such, the Astrologers of old are worthy of reverence. Those ancient star gazers studied the will of the divinity in the fires of night, and read the mystic page with reverence—a reverence which made them love the pleasing and the mild, as well as the startling and the awful. They watched the coming forth of the sweet star of evening, and the herald of morning; the changes of the moon in her usual course, and all the variety that is spread before the eye that deems night too beautiful for sleep. There is indeed something sublime in this employment of the wise men of the East, dealing as they did with the grandest objects in nature, and immeasurably removed from the low and grovelling means resorted to by many nations, for the purposes of forecast and prophecy, or divination. But what shall we say of those who choose to deal only with the terrific phenomena that attract attention in the heavens—who gaze out of their chambers of darkness only to see where the fire is burning, to make a record of a calamity? What shall we say of those who heed not the truth that 'night unto night showeth knowledge' of God, of his presence and glory, and only think they gain knowledge when meteors shine, when showers of fire are seen, when falling stars flash on the eye, and the moon wears a sickly aspect? They never, like the Prophet, wrap themselves in their mantles and adore, when the still small voice speaks from the placid stars and the radiant firmament, but leap forth in ecstasy when the strong wind sweeps by to prostrate the oaks and towers, rending rocks and mountains, or when the earthquake makes the globe quiver and reel, or when the fire flashes and blazes and seems to wrap the heavens in flames. They never go forth at calm eventide to meditate—to lean like Jacob on a staff to worship. They are unmoved before all that is best calculated to awaken lofty and pious feeling, to make man glad in communing with the works of God, but sit like Jonah in his booth waiting for nothing but for signs of the overthrow of Ninevah.

But still the heavens—in the common and uncommon phenomena—declare God's glory, whether the declaration be heeded and understood, or not. They are a radiant page, though we read not aright. They show his handy-work, and all his works display a divine order. Behind all that appears eccentric and ungoverned, a Living Force acts for determined and wise and gracious ends. No fire flashes through the heavens which has not its mission from God. 'He maketh the winds his messengers; the flaming lightnings his ministers.' 'He telleth the number of the stars; he calleth them all by their names.' 'Thou, even Thou, art Lord alone; thou hast made heaven, and the heaven of heavens, with all their host, the earth and all things that are therein, the seas and all that is therein; and thou preservest them all; and the host of heaven worship thee.' 'Who alone spreadeth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea; who maketh Arcturus, Orion and Pleiades, and the chambers of the south.' 'Great things doeth he, which we cannot comprehend.' 'Yea, wonders without number.'

If this be true, let us seek intellectually and with pure moral sentiment, to understand how the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handy-work. Let us enquire as we are able into the mysteries of the stupendous architecture of the heavens, and we shall lose all those superstitious feelings which are kept alive by the imagination that bodies of fire, independent of all laws and capable of consuming the earth, are let loose at times in the heavens. The reins of the winds—of all things are in the closed hand of Deity.

Once an eclipse which is now witnessed without fear, filled nations with terror, so that he was accounted a man of bold thought, who could content himself to be shut up in a close apartment, aired and perfumed, according to the directions of a physician. When in 1456, Halley's comet was seen, the Pope called on all good christians to curse the Turks, (with whom they were at war,) the Comet, and the Devil! Services of great ostentation were performed to avert the evils which, it was thought, were threatened by the strange visitor; as in late years when the Pope, with splendid retinue, went forth in the streets of Rome, to lift The Host to stay the ravages of the Cholera! And so was it with such a visitor as has attracted so much attention the past month. 'A comet is to be seen!' would once have been as fearful a cry, as to the Eastern Caravan is the shout, 'The Simoon is approaching!' or the bursting forth of volcanic fires to those who dwelt at the base of the mountain. A comet's appearance, or what, is taken to be such, now awakens no terror or dread, save in those who have by fanaticism been trained to look on the dark side of every thing. We go out to see and wonder, but not to weep and howl. Multitudes have paused in the thorough-fares of a city to notice the brilliant train of the invisible guest, at noon day, and then have hastened to their daily labors, as we go about our business after beholding a pageant. This fact should be a theme for some meditation, inasmuch, as this comet was acknowledged to be a stranger, and was of unusual splendor and magnitude. The calmness with which it has been viewed—the delight with which all classes have searched for it, affords evidence how extensively the leaven of knowledge has leavened the mass of mind. There are many—there are thousands who gaze on the celestial visitant with pleasure, who can give no scientific account of comets or cometary motions, but they have heard the philosopher or man of science lecture, or they have read accurate accounts of this kind of phenomena, and though they retained no particulars—though they can cite none of the technical terms or phrases, yet they feel the influence of the correct and grateful impression made upon their minds by the lecture or reading. This is one great benefit of giving attendance to such subjects, though we may feel ourselves incapable of retaining particulars. We may hear a lecture on the atmosphere from one fully conversant with the subject or theme, and though we may be unable to retain an analysis of the argument, yet an impression will remain upon our minds, continually reminding us of the value of pure air and certain duties in reference to it. So with the discussion of a metaphysical question in Theology; we retain the impression made by the able discussion and it satisfies us. We may not be able to satisfy others; indeed, we may utterly fail when we attempt to express why we are at peace, but yet there down deep in our mental being, rests the satisfaction which is our comfort and our strength. It soothes us in sorrow, it consoles us in bereavement, and gives us hope under all the varied circumstances of this changeful life.

Such an impression we should have in reference to such mysterious signs in the heavens as have lately been given to us. Signs of God's power—that but parts of his ways are seen. Signs to keep alive the curiosity of the philosopher, and continually to unfold new applications of everlasting laws, that with a deeper emphasis it may be declared, that the firmament shows forth God's handy-work. Loftier and loftier becomes this truth, spreading out a more and more expansive view to the intellectual eye and moral vision, as the soul wings its flight and makes its home among the distant stars, warming itself in the rays of the central suns, and learning the harmony of the eternal music of rushing orbs as they circle round their centres in stupendous courses. If overwhelmed by the immensity of the universe, we lift up our eyes and ask, 'What is man that thou art mindful of him?' as we feel our humiliation, let us kneel at a shrine of light where millions of stars mingle their rays, and list to the answer which shows us our exaltation, which makes spirit superior to matter—'Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet.' Stand up, O man, and feel thy destiny. Make the stars thy footstool. Ask not to view them with the eye of sense, for to behold them as they are—to look in upon the reality, best feeds the soul and makes it expand.

Let the pageant of the Comet, add new attraction to the heavens. We need it all. Our eyes are too much turned to the earth. We were made to look heaven-ward, and list to the voices that come from thence, bidding us not only glory in the intellect which surveys the heavens, but also in the moral feelings by which we feel and appreciate the religion of the stars and adore their God.

The heavens declare the glory of God by revealing the capabilities of Mind to unravel mysteries. Astronomy is a grand tribute of praise to the Creator of Man. It bids us hope on and hope ever for progress—to have faith in the infinite stretching out of the path 'that shineth brighter and brighter.' By the treading on of Mind, facts have been gained—the reality has been seen, as on some lofty eminence that revealer of the immensity of God—The Telescope—was lifted up, and the vision of unutterable magnificence was beheld. Mind has still trodden on farther and farther, higher and higher, from lofty mountain to loftier Alp, and from Peak to Peak, till firmament on firmament are gazed upon, and God is still adored.

A Comet is not now a fire lighted up in our atmosphere, to be but little regarded. Neither is it an eccentric body, but a member of the solar system, obedient to the great laws of attraction. It has ceased to be a terrible visitant, but affords subject matter for pleasing and lofty contemplation. We are eager for its appearance, that we may study the attending phenomena, and follow its course, by imagination, as it pursues its path far on and up through space, passing the planets, as the swift car, with its brilliant clouds of vapor, rushes on over the iron way leaving town after town as it flies. The time of a reappearance is accurately predicted; the place where first it is to be seen, is told us; the path it is to describe, is traced in the heavens; the increase of its light, and the rate of its progress, are detailed; and when it will be visible only with the aid of a telescope, and when the naked eye may behold it, are predicted. A variation in reference to one has demonstrated the existence of a resisting medium—that the celestial spaces are not void, which discovery is connected with many important matters, opening great questions for science.

And thus mind goes on, learning new truths by the errors into which it occasionally falls, affording a double lesson—a lesson of care and a lesson of encouragement. Thus may it be with us in all departments of Thought and Study. If we have the true love of knowledge, if we desire earnestly to read more of the reality of things in the moral world, we shall not lose our reward; no, not even if through the imperfection of our minds or means we fall into errors; those very errors shall minister to our good, teaching us the necessity of more care and leading us into new trains of thought. But if we turn away from knowledge and let our minds slumber, we shall often be as were the disciples of old, who were terrified and affrighted, supposing they had seen a spirit, when in fact they had gazed on the risen Jesus, the Prince of Life!

IMPROMPTU—BIRTH DAY EPISTLE.

TO MY FRIEND S. C. E.

DID you happen to know, dear Sarah,
When my birth-day would fall?
And didn't the very thought of it,
Your gentle heart appal?
I'm getting antiquated—
(The truth must needs be told—)
But then, as N. P. Willis says,
'My heart is not yet old!'

You know I love all pleasant things—
The still, secluded nook—
The sunny glade, the forest-path,
The merry, chiming brook;
And the sweet, purple violets,
Amid the wavy grass,
That look up with their smiling eyes,
And greet us as we pass.

I am a very child, among
The pretty, fragrant flowers;
And they are still as dear to me
As in my childhood's hours.
Now, dear, don't think I mean to ape
Young ladies, sentimental—
The mention of that simple fact,
Was purely accidental!

Or rather, it came gushing out
From an o'erflowing heart,
For of my very being
The violets seem a part!
How I have been digressing,
Dear Sarah, from my text—
Now pray don't be impatient,
But hear what's coming next.

My spring-time has departed,
With the balmy April rains!
Why can't you write an elegy,—
I'll thank you, for your pains!
And let it be a mournful one,
For 'tis a cause of grief,
That I am falling into
'The sere and yellow leaf.'

Now don't forget it, Sarah,
I am serious, be sure—
I wish that you could see me now,
I'm looking so demure!
But pray don't say how old I am,—
I shouldn't like it told;
For, really, 'tis a dreadful thing,
That I am getting old!

WOMAN'S INFLUENCE. In the ordinary affairs of life, a woman has a greater influence over those near her than a man. While our feelings are, for the most part, as retired as anchorites, hers are in constant play before us. We hear them in her varying voice; we see them in the beautiful and harmonious undulations of her movements, in the quick shifting hues of her face, in her eye, glad and bright, then fond and suffused. Her whole frame is alive and active with what is at her heart, and all the outward form speaks. She seems of a finer mould than we, and cast in a form of beauty, which, like all beauty, acts with a moral influence upon our hearts; and, as she moves about us, we feel a movement within, which rises and spreads gently over us, harmonizing us with her own. And can any man listen to this? Can his eye rest upon this, day after day; and he be not touched, and be made better?

EDITOR'S BOOK TABLE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., MAY, 1843.

The Ladies' Repository. Boston, Ms.

We have good reasons for asking the attention of our readers first of all, to our own work. Some of these reasons are the following;—the present No. is the last but one of this volume; our subscription list is small; we have suffered much from delinquents; and it is desirable to continue the work. We receive the strongest commendations from all quarters, but these do not pay the printer, nor satisfy the publisher. The best approval of the work is an extensive circulation, which we think ought to be given to it, if a tithe of the praise bestowed is just. We say this with all modesty, referring only to the want of such a work in our denomination, and knowing the great good it has wrought in various portions of the States. If those who have expressed warm approvals, would each exert themselves personally to obtain one new subscriber, a great addition would be made to our list—an addition which is essentially needed. Is it too much to ask this? We hope not. Let our friends consider the typographical beauty of this Magazine—its Christian tone, and the variety and excellence of its contents, and that it will not suffer in comparison with any work of like design in any other denomination of Christians,—let them think also of its influence on a large class of minds which are not and cannot be reached by our weekly papers, and then answer whether they will do something to contribute to its continuance and prosperity? We need all that can be done.

With the next volume we shall leave off the first member of the title of our work, as it is every where known by the last—'The Ladies' Repository.' We sometimes find three articles taken from this work in one paper, and credited one to 'The Universalist and Ladies Repository;' the next to 'the Universalist;' and the next to the 'Repository,' as though they were taken from three different publications. And more than this:—our denominational paper in Connecticut, is called 'The Universalist;' and articles appear in other papers from both that and this work credited alike. After due deliberation, we have been led to coincide with the opinions of a great many of our friends, and send the Repository forth without the distinctive name of Universalist, believing that its contents will always give it a distinctive character. We once thought we could never be led to do this, but circumstances have altered our convictions, and we are sure that the considerations which prompt us now to do it, are of as Christian a character as those which once made us strenuous to retain the name we relinquish—relinquish from the Magazine, but not from our heart, nor from our brow.

And now friends of this work! give us encouragement and see if we do not give you reward enough in the increasing excellence of the Repository. We have had seven years experience in conducting this work, and hesitate not to say, that the future will excel the past. We can command facilities to make the work excellent which we have never had before, and therefore we say—Who will aid us? Let the prospectus come back well filled, or at least with one name.

Family Prayer Book. By Otis A. Skinner.

The prospectus of this work was sent out in our last No., and we wish to again call attention to it as worthy of the consideration of all who desire such an aid to devotion. The advantages of Family Worship are many, appealing to the purest and strongest feelings and affections of the human soul, and wherever there is not ability or confidence to attend to this service without aid, this work will afford all that can be desired. There is a very large class of minds which can be benefited by a work of this character, aiding the development and expression of devotional thought and feeling. By its suggestive power, it will give food to the mind, and, abstracting the soul from sense, will lead it to that spiritual communion which sanctifies the temper and prepares the individual to rightly discharge the varied duties of life. As the prospectus is before our readers, it is not needful for us to speak in detail of the character of the work; we need only remark our full confidence that it will be a good work, well adapted to promote its design. It will be ready for subscribers early this month, and will be the handsomest book ever sent forth by the publisher, and all his publications have been admired for the neatness and beauty of typography. A beautiful design will ornament the binding.

Shall we not strongly hope that a very extensive circulation will be given to this work? We trust the returns will tell the interest which our sisters take in the publication. Let the prospectus be returned as soon as possible, wherever names are obtained. It will not only be a work suitable for family, but also for private devotions, and will give direction to morning and evening thought, which shall bring down from heaven blessings on the day and calmness on the night.

The Will and the Affections. A Sermon by Rev. Andrew P. Peabody, pastor of the South Church, Portsmouth, N. H.

The above titled Sermon was prepared for the ordination of Mr. Richard Pike, now settled as Pastor of the Unitarian Society in Dorchester, but was not delivered in consequence of 'unavoidable causes of detention on the Eastern Railroad.' We are glad that the Society requested its publication, because of its excellence and its fitness to the times. It discusses an important theme, and will do good to all readers but those whose 'meddling' cold metaphysics, 'misshape the beauteous forms of things, and murder to dissect.'

The text is Phil. iv, 13, and the Sermon opens with the position that 'Our views of the extent of human ability necessarily lie at the basis of our theology—'if we think too meanly of man's nature and native ability we lumber our theology with excessive and superfluous doctrines,—if we in any wise over estimate man's nature and ability, in that same proportion our theology becomes defective and meagre, our respect for revelation declines, and our sense of the need and worth of religion fades away.' Two opposite views equally erroneous, have divided the Christian world, the motto of one party being—'I can do nothing;' that of the other, 'I can do all things,'—man's utter moral inability, and the unlimited freedom of the human will. Neither is the doctrine of consciousness or experience—of the Scriptures of the Primitive Church. The bearing of these views on Christian theology is to be discussed; a belief in the first leads to the adoption of arbitrary schemes of redemption, as in the dark ages and in the Roman church salvation was wrought out by ceremonies and outward ordinances, which were considered to possess in themselves a sanctifying power. The same found expression in the doctrines of the Reformed Church, such as the doctrines of Predestination, Sovereign, constraining grace, and arbitrary election, setting forth that all that is good in human heart or character, is the result of God's arbitrary decree. The evils of the other view are next treated of; and we are shown how the doctrine of the entire, unlimited freedom of the human will, gives a very partial and low view of Christianity, and makes a large portion of its records unessential and worthless. It assigns no place or office to the paternal character of God, to the beauty of holiness in the Savior's life, to the cross or the intercession of Jesus—gives no place to prophecy or miracle, and leads to the treatment of the more than human beauty and glory that rested upon Jesus, as the mythological drapery, in which men's superstitious fancies have wrapped the simple form of truth.

The preacher laments the injurious influence exerted by this false philosophy of the human will upon some of the Unitarian clergy, and contends that there is a deeper moral disease than ignorance or indifference. We may know our duty, may feel most thrillingly the curse and penalty of violated law, and yet lack the power to keep the law. There is an infirmity of the will, which, more than aught else, needs the aid of religion and the strength of Christ, and which it is Christ's peculiar Mission to heal. Arminian theology has overlooked this. It is recognized in scripture—Rom. vii,—it is confessed in common speech, and felt in every one's experience. Yet he contends that man is a free agent. But the seat of his moral freedom lies far behind those separate volitions which make up his daily life. Over these, we have no sure control. We obey the law, they follow the bent of the character. It is our love that is free. It may attach itself to what, or to whom we will. The affections govern the will and control the life—they must furnish the remedy for the infirm and diseased will. Religious love must strengthen and sanctify the will, and convert its lameness for all that is good into a blessed necessity of holy living, of duty and of progress.

In his unregenerate state man's will is lame, because his love is cold. The object, therefore, of the Gospel is to quicken his love—to fasten his affections, the gratitude and confidence of the heart, upon God and Jesus, and through the action of these make man omnipotent over evil—ready to meet any demand of duty. Those portions of the Gospel which best set forth the love of God and of Jesus, are its most prominent and essential features—they constitute the peculiar excellence, the crowning glory of the Gospel. They furnish religion with its motive power. They supply what man most of all needs,—something to bind his affections to the infinite and the heavenly. A religion of mere law would have been impotent, in proportion to its perfectness. By law alone is the 'knowledge of sin,' and the consciousness of weakness; but when the love of Jesus dawns upon the heart its language is, 'I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me.'

The subject is then applied very happily to the occasion, and the great moral is established—that the awakening and the cultivation of the religious affections, is the first and chief aim to be had in view in preaching the Gospel.

We express our thanks to the author for a copy, for it has done us good, and we rejoice in every effort which is directed to stay the progress of the false pride of reason and that tendency of rationalistic theology which alike speaks of Socrates and Jesus, denying the Authoritative element in Christianity.

Lectures to Youth. By S. R. Smith.

A work with the above title has been issued from the press at Philadelphia, but we have not seen it, as it has neither been sent to this, nor to the Gospel Messenger, office. So with Br. S. R. Smith's Sermon.

Letter to the Publisher.

SHIRLEY VILLAGE.

Br. TOMPKINS;—I received safely, and thankfully you know, the books that you and our kind friend Mussey were so thoughtful as to send me. Except for the shower of religious periodicals weekly dispensed to me from the four quarters of Zion, I should suffer somewhat from a literary dearth, being so far removed from Libraries, Bookstores, and Publishing offices; and when a dispensation, like the one acknowledged, comes upon our famished household, why, verily, there is little ceremony used at the book-table.

THE LAST OF THE BARONS, from Mr. Mussey, was read with the avidity Bulwer's late novels may warrant one in betraying. We all pronounced it one of his best. It has not the brilliancy of Eugene Aram, Rienzi, The Last Days of Pompeii, Zanon, and some other of the author's works, yet it is as uniformly interesting as any we have read. The character of the King-Maker is a noble one, and even his pride becomes him, he wears it so loftily. Sybill is the favorite female character, though I had many a word of favor for Lady Bonville. Old Adam, the Philosopher, is one of those Intellectual Abstractions whom Bulwer excels in delineating. 'Kill me! kill me!' said the old man, sublimely, throwing himself between his beloved model and those who would demolish it, 'but oh! not my THOUGHT!'

Yourself,—I thank for a copy of Br. Chapin's LECTURES. M. — said, taking up the book after I had read it, 'why did you not mark all the passages?' I should if I had marked all that I approve. I have a wish, in reading a good book, like that the poet would have us cherish in living a life—a wish, in closing it, to leave behind me

'Footprints, that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
Seeing, shall take heart again.'

And so I sometimes make those 'prints,' when I intend placing the book in the hands of a forlorn brother or sister, hoping they may 'take heart,' from the cheering doctrines, and noble sentiments thus pointed out to them.—But the LECTURES—what do I think of them? Why, that they are the embodiment of the pure spirit of Universalism—the utterance of an earnest, free, and deeply-christianized Soul. I like, more than I can tell, the noble Charity, the sublime doctrine of Tolerance, so eloquently enforced. God grant free course to this holy spirit of 'Catholic indulgence.' We have been Sectaries too long—let us be Christians now—Universalist Christians; and however reviled, let us revile not again; and if they smite us on the right cheek, we will turn to them the left also.

The 'Independent Magazine and Health Journal,'—or vice versa,—I have read with attention. 'Hereafter,' by John Neal, has, though a short piece, many true and just thoughts. We may say the same of Greeley's article on 'The Formation of Character.' I like the object of this Magazine—in the main. I like its principles. The Editor is a zealous Reformist—one who believes that 'the world is wrong collectively, and individually;' and as such, aims to correct it. I confess I have not the 'large faith' requisite to be a working disciple of the blended Philosophies of Kant, Fourier, and Sylvester Graham; but I would not scatter the smallest dew-drop to damp the ardor of one who has; for I honor the Philanthropist and the Reformer, whatever badge he wears, or to whatever School he belongs. So I say, success to the Independent Magazine!—progress to all its projected Reforms! verily, if there is one being on earth who needs the voice of sympathy and encouragement, it is the individual who crusades against existing institutions, and promulgates doctrines antagonist to the appetites and established habits of his race. And however much of a 'visionary and enthusiast' such an individual may be, give him due credit for an earnest soul and a sincere desire to serve the world in which he lives.

While I am speaking of books, periodicals, &c., allow me space for a word or two about the 'LOWELL OFFERING.' I receive it regularly from the hand of Miss Farley, the talented editor. (N. B. I don't like Edit-ress, nor Poet-ess. Roughen them as I will, they still have a soft, lackadaisical sound not half so grateful to the ear as dairy-maid.) I believe Miss F. deserves much praise for the energy she exerts in her new sphere of duty. I trust her sister-operatives lend her all the assistance and sympathy in their power, for her office is one of trial and discouragement. Those 'STORIES FROM THE LIMBIDE,' are very pretty, though we hope they will not all be sad ones. J. S. W. has a graphic style—she should be a generous contributor. So also, should she who has so ingeniously paraphrased the Apostle's chapter on 'Charity.' The leading article in the March No., upon the same Subject, is well written, and in the right vein. The articles are generally short, and full of life. For this, we like it; for in this age of the world there is nothing like variety.

UNIVERSALIST AND LADIES' REPOSITORY.

JUNE 1843.

SOWING IN TEARS—REAPING IN JOY.

BY REV. E. M. PINGREE.

'He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.' PSALM CXXVI. 6.

THIS beautiful and expressive language of the Psalmist king is generally supposed to refer to the mission of Messiah—the Savior of the world. The allusion here, by way of illustration, is readily seen to be to the labors of the husbandman; and although we are all familiar with those labors and their fruits, it may be proper for us to reflect upon them, for a moment, in order to see the full force of the passage, as applied to Jesus Christ, his mission, and the accomplishment of the object of that mission.

In the Spring, then, the farmer goes out, prepares his ground—ploughs and harrows it, making it ready to receive the seed. After sowing the seed—the precious seed, he waits, during summer, the growth of that which he has sown or planted. When Autumn comes, he cuts the grain, cures it, brings it home, and stores it away in the barn—the garner;—he 'brings his sheaves with him,' and 'with rejoicing.' In New England, as most of our readers are aware, a day is appointed by the Governor of the State, to be observed in thanksgiving and praise to God, for the ingathered harvest—the glorious, joyous thanksgiving day. On that day, the scattered members of the family are gathered around the festal board, under the roof of the 'father of them all;' and gratitude, cheerfulness, and joy pervade every breast. On that day too, the people are called together at the house of worship, to offer due praise and the expressions of thankfulness to Him who has so abundantly blessed their labors, that they have gathered in a bountiful harvest.

Such also I suppose to be the object of the English 'Harvest Home.' That too, is observed by feasting, dancing, and praising God—all for the blessing of Heaven having been upon the labors of the husbandman.

But, if no harvest, then no 'rejoicing'—no 'thanksgiving day,' no 'harvest home.' If blight, storms, or mildew blast the crops, so that no 'sheaves' are brought home to fill the garner, then there is no joy; or, if an enemy ravage the country, destroying all in his course—all the hopes of the husbandman, so that nothing be gathered for the sustenance of himself and family, then also is there no 'rejoicing;' but rather fear, sorrow, and lamentation.

Let these several points of the Psalmist's illustration be kept in mind, as we proceed to apply them to the mission of 'the Savior of the world:' 1. The sowing of the seed, in the Spring; 2. Waiting, during Summer, for the growth of the grain; 3. The 'bringing in of the sheaves,' in Autumn; 4. The consequent rejoicing; while, 5. If no harvest—no joy.

The period of Christ's first Advent, then, may be called the Spring time of his labors, of his mission and reign. Then he 'went forth weeping, bearing precious seed.' By 'precious seed' here, I presume we may understand 'the good word of the kingdom,' 'the Gospel of the grace of God that bringeth salvation to all men:' his sowing the seed, signifying the establishment of the Gospel Kingdom and reign in the world. In doing this, the Savior suffered; hence the propriety of the expression—'goeth forth and weepeth;' for it is emphatically said of him, that 'he was a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief.'

The evangelical Prophet so forcibly and strikingly sets forth the sufferings of Messiah, that I cannot forbear quoting his language in this connection. 'Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed? For he shall grow up before him as a tender plant, and as a root out of a dry ground: he hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him. He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and we hid as it were our faces from him: he was despised, and we esteemed him not. Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows: yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted.'

But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed. All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all. He was oppressed, and he was afflicted; yet he opened not his mouth;

he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth. He was taken from prison and from judgment: and who shall declare his generation? for he was cut off out of the land of the living: for the transgression of my people was he stricken. And he made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death; because he had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth.' Isa. liii. 1-9.

From this, we see how properly and emphatically it may be said of the Savior, in the language of Daniel, he went 'forth weeping, bearing precious seed.' His whole life, while on earth, illustrates the truth of the same declaration. We all have learned from the Evangelists' histories of his life, how much he endured, in accomplishing the mighty work committed to him;—how he said of himself, that, comparatively speaking, 'he had not where to lay his head;' how his countrymen hated him, persecuted him, and hunted him down, as they would hunt a wild beast of prey; how one of his chosen disciples betrayed him, with a kiss, and how another denied him; how he was brought before a civil tribunal, to receive a mock trial, his enemies putting a crown of thorns upon his brow, a purple robe upon his shoulders, and a reed in his hand, and then bowing the knee, in mockery, and crying, 'Hail! King of the Jews!' how they buffeted him, scourged him, gave him vinegar and gall to drink, and spit upon him; and how, finally, the enraged multitude led him up Calvary, and crucified him between two malefactors—hung him between the heavens and the earth, a spectacle to angels and to men, while his enemies stood by, insulting and taunting him, crying out, 'If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross!'

In view of all this, we can appreciate the correctness and expressiveness of the declaration, as applied to the Savior—'He went forth weeping'—he indeed 'sowed in tears.'

Now, if we may so speak, is the Summer time of the Savior's labors—of his mission and reign. Now, he is awaiting the growth of that which he sowed, while on earth. Now, he is awaiting the progress of that kingdom which he established in the world. By and by will be the harvest. By and by, in his own and God's appointed time, he will 'come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.'

Of this result of the labors of the Son of God, of the certain accomplishment of the ultimate object of his mission, there should be no doubt in our minds. The Psalmist felt and expressed no such doubtfulness or uncertainty; he speaks positively, and with perfect and unwavering assurance:—'He shall, doubtless,' that's the word, 'shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.'

The same result of the labors, the same consummation of the reign, of the Messiah, may be found taught in other parts of the Scriptures, as in the passage at the head of this article. For instance, Daniel sets it forth under the figure of 'a stone cut out without hands, that became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth.' So it shall be with the kingdom of Jesus Christ; that shall increase, and flourish, and prosper, until it shall embrace all minds—all hearts. The Savior himself, referring to the progress and consummation of the same kingdom,—the kingdom of which men 'do not say, Lo! here, or lo! there; but which is within' us, that is, 'righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit,'—says it 'is like leaven, which a woman hid in three measures of meal, until the whole was leavened.' So also Paul teaches, in the 15th chap. 1 Cor., that this kingdom shall be delivered up to God the Father, when—and not until then—'when he shall have subdued all things unto himself,' destroyed man's last enemy, and then shall God become 'all in all.' Glorious consummation! well worthy the Lord God omnipotent. This is the final harvest—the bringing in of the sheaves. Then will be a time of joy among the hosts of heaven,—the joy of angels, of the saved, and of the Son of God himself; for 'it was the joy set before him,—this joy,—that he endured the cross, and despised the shame.' O! that will be a glorious 'thanksgiving time,' in eternity, the glorious 'Harvest Home' of heaven, when all the redeemed and purified sons of men shall be brought home, to be preserved forever in the garner of the Lord God Almighty—such a 'thanksgiving time,' and such a 'harvest home,' as Old or New England never saw—such a blessedness and joy as has not been known since 'the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. Alleluia! Then shall be fulfilled the beautiful prophetic declaration of 'the sweet singer of Israel'—'He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.'

This 'rejoicing' is spoken of in other parts of the Divine Word, as in the parable of the lost sheep;—I know this is changing the figure somewhat; but no matter for that;—when the shepherd finds the sheep that has strayed away, the Savior represents him as 'calling his friends and neighbors together, saying to them, Rejoice with me, for I have found the sheep that was lost. So, added the Savior, there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth.' Thus it is not the joy of the saved alone, nor of the Redeemer alone; but it is the joy of the angelic hosts—the joy of all heaven.

But, no harvest—no joy. This is true of the natural husbandman; and it would be also true of the great moral Husbandman. Suppose the Savior to fail in what he has undertaken, could he then rejoice? But what a supposition is that! The Son of Almighty God fail! He who is upheld and sustained by the omnipotent arm of Him who made and who guides and controls all worlds and all beings, fail! Might there not then be applied to him the language which himself uttered, on a certain occasion! 'What man of you, going to build a tower, sitteth not down first and counteth the cost, whether he be able to finish it? lest haply, after having laid the foundation, he be not able to finish it,—ay, 'finish' is the word; no matter what else he does; though he lay the foundation, and put up the walls, yet if he 'be not able to finish' the work,—they that behold it begin to mock him—as well they may,—saying, this man began to build, but was not able to finish.' Who, then, would hold a sentiment that would make the blessed and mighty Son of God the subject of such solemn mockery as that? Yet all the forms of Arminianism, which say Jesus Christ has undertaken to save the entire world, but cannot do it, place him where he could not avoid merited mockery, like that deserved by a foolish man who should undertake to build a tower, without 'first counting the cost, whether he were able to finish.' But grant for a moment,—however impious the thought, and dishonoring to the Savior,—that he may fail in the great work he has undertaken—the work of saving and purifying a world of human intelligences; grant that Satan may prove mightier than the Son of Almighty God, and take to himself and to eternal torture, a great portion of those whom Jesus designed and endeavored to save, but vainly, the inquiry forces itself upon our minds, can the Savior then rejoice?—can it then be said that he has 'come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him,' if the devil be beforehand with him, reap the 'sheaves' that belong to him, and drag them away to eternal burnings? Every mind and voice must answer, emphatically, no! In case of such a failure, so shameful a defeat on the part of the Savior, in view of only a partial, a blasted and blighted harvest, there would not be witnessed or enjoyed that glorious 'thanksgiving time' in eternity, nor

'The angels shout the harvest home.'

But we need have no fears that the Son of God will be so defeated and discomfited; 'he shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.' No arm, no power can turn back his arm stretched out for the salvation of a sinful world; for the Father 'hath given him all power in heaven and in earth,' necessary for the complete accomplishment of the object of his mission. The same, too, is the explicit testimony of the Prophet, in the chapter from which has been copied the detail of the Messiah's sufferings—showing how he went 'forth weeping, bearing precious seed.' His language is, 'The pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand.' Isa. liii. 10. What was the pleasure of the Lord, in the mission of Jesus Christ? All, except the strict Calvinist, who believes it is God's pleasure to keep some of his creatures sinful and wretched forever, will answer, It was that all men might ultimately become pure, holy, happy; and so they answer correctly; for such is the teaching of holy Writ. Then remember the declaration of God's holy prophet,—and let no mortal tongue dare to impiously contradict it,—'The pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand.'

In the next verse, and to the same effect, the prophet adds, 'He shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied.' For what, and for whom, did the Savior travail in soul—labor, toil, suffer, die? Was it not for the salvation of a sinful world? that he might finally bring all souls to the great garner above? So the Scriptures teach, and so most men now admit, for old Calvinism is getting out of fashion and out of date. Now the question urges itself upon us, Can the Son of God 'be satisfied,' unless he fully accomplish the work that he has undertaken? unless all are purified for whom he 'travailed in soul?' Every heart will answer, no! But the sacred penman solemnly affirms, 'He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied.' May none of us wickedly reject his testimony.

Reader, suppose the midnight slumbers of a sleeping family to be suddenly broken by the startling cry of, Fire! fire! Suppose an individual to save all the inmates of the burning house, but one, who perishes in the flames—no matter from what cause, whether a Calvinian or Arminian cause. Then suppose that individual to get across the street, very complacently fold his arms, and say, 'I tried to save all that were in that house, but I could not; one has miserably perished in the flames; but I am satisfied—perfectly satisfied.' What would you say of such a man? Would you not call him a monster—a demon—a very devil? and would he not be cursed by all men? Would not the execrations of an indignant community rest on his head, and he be driven from human society, as unfit to dwell among men? And yet how much worse is that man than some creeds represent the Son of God to be?—saying that he will express himself satisfied at the conclusion of his reign, while half the souls, more or less, for whom he travailed, shall forever be in the hands of satan, to suffer all the torments of an ever enduring hell! Out upon such a sentiment! away with it! It is false as the Koran, and most dishonorable to the Savior.

No! Jesus will never 'be satisfied,' until 'he shall see of the travail of his soul'—until he shall bring all the sons of men to enjoy the eternal 'Harvest Home'—never, never. But O! what ecstasy will thrill his bosom, as he shall return to heaven and to God, with a world of human intelligences, redeemed, purified, amid the shouts of all the angelic hosts above. Then, and not till then, will he exclaim, in the fullness of the joy of his soul, 'I am satisfied.' Well and truly did David say—'He that soweth in tears, shall reap in joy.'

MOURNFUL THOUGHTS.

BY THOMAS L. HARRIS.

'The yearnings of the soul for brotherhood
And all that makes us wise and pure and good
Come, broken-hearted home again to die.'

S. R. LOVELL.

IN truth it is a bitter task, a sad and mournful strife
To linger in this weary scene in mockery called 'Life ;'
To strive to keep within the heart sweet, Eden flowers in bloom,
While round me spreads on every hand the winter's cheer-
less gloom ;
To see the hopes of youth's fair spring all, one by one, depart,
Till scarce a lingerer remains to cheer the fainting heart ;
To hear the storm of sorrow wail with wild unending moan,
And wander in this stranger-world forsaken and alone.

I see the fair and beautiful throng round my daily path,
I hear around warm household hearths full oft the merry laugh,
Sweet words that breathe of melody, all angel-like and clear,
Like to a star-lit fountain's chime, oft fell upon mine ear ;
Yet, though they come from gentle hearts, in youthful beauty glad,
They fill my heart with agony, and make me very sad ;
Alas ! I feel no kindred heart responds unto mine own,
I wander in this stranger-land forsaken and alone !

I know no dear one e'er will mourn, no soft eye fill with tears,
While furrows steal across my brow like shades of passing years ;
That heartless hirelings will surround my last, my dying bed,
And not a tear will fall when I am numbered with the dead,
That ere Spring's first frail blossoms rise above my lowly grave,
My memory will be o'erwhelmed by cold oblivion's wave.
Why should remembrance linger on, when life's brief day hath flown,
Of one who trod this stranger-world forsaken and alone ?

Yet, floating o'er the fearful din of sorrow and of wrong,
A voice from heaven bids my heart, to 'suffer and be strong,'
To lift each hope, each thought, above this darkened vale
of time,
To an existence yet to come, more glorious and sublime ;
To live for God ! in word, in deed, to sing and act his praise,
With deeds of steadfast nobleness, with high and star-tuned lays,
Then, through the tomb's low, grassy door pass to a better home,
And tread no more this stranger-world forsaken and alone !

If preachers want to have mankind religious, they must first teach them to be morally virtuous. PR.

OMNIPRESENCE OF GOD.

I HAVE just been listening to some remarks made on a sermon, the theme of which was the Omnipresence of God—a sublime subject for contemplation. In the course of this sermon, it seems, the preacher labored to show that the presence of God in hell would be the punishment of the doomed creatures in the prison house of despair. The victims of his wrath will see him as he is and themselves as they are, and this will blast all happiness. Now, with perfect soberness, and reverent feeling, I wish to pen a few thoughts which are suggested by this singular idea. And first, it sounds strange to hear of God being in hell—understanding that term in the popular sense. We are usually told that hell is in a part of space where the presence of God never shines, and however this doctrine mars the truth of the Deity's omnipresence, his infinity, yet it is maintained that the wicked are to be banished from his presence ! But it would seem that the inconsistency of this idea has been discovered—that souls cannot exist without God's presence—and now it is admitted that the Divine presence extends even to the regions of darkness where hope can never come. The only object of the Presence there, is to torture ! How at variance with all we know of God—with all that Scripture says of his Presence ! Wherever we trace the presence of God, the proofs of the existence of Deity, in this world, we trace evidences of his love as well as judgment—and will eternity contradict the harmony of the divine attributes ?

Again ; if the Presence of God reaches any where where his grace has not power to come, then his grace is not infinite, his justice becomes unmerciful, and his power vindictive. Hell is an exhibition of wrath untempered with goodness, and we are left to muse on the paradox, that the same Presence which gives unmixed joy to the abode of bliss, gives unmixed misery to the abode of wo. But unmixed evil cannot exist under the government of a perfect Being.

Once more ;—the very process that now converts and sanctifies the soul, is, in the future world, to fix unalterably the miserable fate of sinners ! To see God as he is, and ourselves as we are, is all that is essential to that renewing of mind which begets regeneration. This must be, so long as Truth is omnipotent—so long as the laws of mind are the same as now ; and it is awful—it is revolting to all christian sensibility, to regard for a moment as true the monstrous idea, that our heavenly Father will pour down perpetually the light of his presence on a portion of his dependant creatures, only to torture their sight, as the barbarians of old brought out their prisoners from the deep darkness of the dungeon suddenly into the overwhelming sunshine of noon day.

But away with this great error. In our Father's house are many mansions—many spheres of being—and in all his Presence shines—shines to bless, enlighten, and redeem.—The glory of the divine government must be according to the perfection of its results, and the old poet Gambold was right when he sang,—

‘The man

That could surround the sum of things, and spy
The heart of God, and secrets of his empire,
Would speak but love; with him the bright result
Would change the hue of intermediate scenes,
And make one thing of all theology.’

The moral of our reflections is plain. If we recognize the Presence of God as being with even the wicked to bless and redeem, through chastenings to discipline for a higher life, let us mingle mercy with all our judgments, and divorce vindictiveness from all anger. The symbol of God’s spirit at the baptism of Jesus, was not a vulture, but a dove; and it should ever be so to us, that with every thought of his Presence may come remembrances of his love—that we may ‘stand in awe and sin not’—and ever cultivate those amiabilities of heart and character which will render us acceptable in the sight of Him, before whom ‘all things are naked and opened, and with whom we have to do.’

CHRISTIAN REFORM AND CHRISTIAN DUTY.

BY REV. JOHN G. ADAMS.

ALL around us, with the improvements of civilization there are bursting forth into life and beauty the developements of Christian love. Although we cannot, in conscience, be answerable for every individual measure of the reformers—although to our minds many of their movements may seem injudicious, immature, and even injurious for a time, yet in these main moral enterprises of our day we may behold the earnest strivings of Christian principle with the ignorance, selfishness, pride and fashion of the world. And if these movements seem slow, they are none the less sure. If Christian principle is on their side, vain, vain will be the strife of error, when once they have begun their onward course,—when once their leaven has commenced working in the great mind of humanity.

It will be well for us, as Christians, to remember this whenever called upon to speak or act in reference to the many reforms in operation around us. Although to our understandings all the measures of reformers may not seem judicious, nor all the logic by which they defend their position, of the true kind; yet, if the great question itself involve the interests of truth and humanity, we should beware what words we use, and what influences we exert against it.

For example: there is the Missionary enterprise. All connected with it in the past and present, we cannot fellowship. This we say from honest, Christian conviction. Yet we would speak naught but good of the idea—of the principle. It is the effort of Christian love to enlighten and bless darkened and degraded humanity. Better that our tongues be silent, than that we speak lightly of an enterprise like this! Stripped of its errors, it will yet carry God’s salvation to the ends of the earth.

There, too, is the Temperance enterprise. While we may not all see eye to eye in reference to the action of its numerous friends; while imprudence, and intolerance, and unwarrantable coercion, and other evils incident to erring humanity, may appear in its progress; yet it is for us to remember that beneath all these there is at work the great principle of righteousness against sin—good against evil—purity, strength and freedom against vice, and debility, and the bondage of death. And in this strife we are to be engaged. Our influence should go into it;—nor should the ills with which this reform may be beset, ever furnish an occasion to speak lightly of it,—to turn away with indifference or distaste from its claims. Christianity speaks in these claims;—and just so far as we are false to them, under the pretence that individual measures are objectionable, just so far do we reply against God, and call in question by our conduct, a cause upon which he has set the shining seal of his everlasting approbation.

Similar remarks apply to the great movement for the abolition of slavery. Object as we may, (and as I think we certainly must,) to certain movements connected with this mighty enterprise, this furnishes no good reason why we should think or speak lightly of the reform itself. There is but one interest which should speak, here. It is the human—the Christian interest. To this we should be true;—and this will lead us to pray, and labor, and strive in every position, and by every righteous means, for the destruction of the hideous and infernal enemy of man against which this idea and operation of freedom are directed. As Christ’s freemen, we are to hold no parley with that spirit which would even dare to whisper in justification of human bondage and human wrong. We should look upon slavery as dead,—dead in that bright and burning future where heavenly truth is in such successful and marvellous operation! And full of the spirit of this truth, we should bear our consistent and righteous testimony ever in favor of this most desirable and godly consummation.

These are but a portion of the many reforms based on the Christian principle. In them all we must remember that the moral creation of God is striving to pass from death unto life. He who came to bring grace and truth, hath there an interest. Let us see that this same interest is ours also.

BETTER is it so to live as not to mourn when we die.

THE WRECK.

BY MISS H. JANE WOODMAN.

A FEW winters since, during one of those storms which were so destructive to home bound vessels, a stately ship was cast upon one of the islands that line our coast. She was seen by a pitying group on shore, and every effort was made to reach her with a life-boat, but in vain. During the pauses of the storm, the mournful tolling of the ship's bell was plainly heard, nor did it cease till the ship went to pieces; and occasionally, a sadder sound than that—the death-shriek of some hapless victim—added to the horrors of the scene. The Captain and some of the crew belonged to the port only a mile or two distant.

FERCELY and loud the storm-wind blew,
Around the brave, despairing crew;
The threatening waves ran mountains high,
Dark as the clouds that swept the sky,—
Then sunk as if the ocean bed
Had opened to engulf the dead!
Tossed like a light and worthless thing,
Is the proud ship whose sails yet cling
Unto its dripping, shattered sides,
While, driven by the wind it rides
The roughest billows, and the blast—
Hurrying with fearful fury past—
Strains every plank, till, by its power
They break like stem of autumn flower!
Masts, rudder, cables—where are they?
Ask not the ocean for its prey!

But see! the fatal shore it nears!
Now are wild hopes, and wilder fears,
Waging a fearful strife with those Around whose bark the waters close!
See! with the last faint hope of life,
Madly they meet the tempest's strife,
They see the life-boat on the wave—
Alas! alas! it cannot save!
And they are dashing to the shore
That shows a friendly port no more.

Amid the pauses of the storm
The landsmen see the shattered form,
And hear, oh! fearful tale to tell—
The tolling of the lost ship's bell!
Could sadder sound arrest the ear,
Or rend the heart with grief and fear?
Rocked by the wave, that funeral bell
Pealed out its sadly solemn knell!
But oh! there is a sadder tone
Borne on the wild wing of the blast,
A death-shriek of despair—a moan
The longest and the last,—
As one by one the frozen band
Are scattered on the fatal strand!
And still the burden of despair
Rung out upon the wintry air,
Nor ceased until the sea was strowed
With fragments of the ship that rode
Like fretted courser to its goal,
Maddened and heedless of control!

God of the storm! The sailor's prayer,
Wrung from the depths of his despair,
Went up to Thee in that dread hour!
To thee who checks the tempest's power!
Known only to thyself the thought
With such a weight of anguish fraught,
Of breaking hearts that wait in vain
To greet the rover of the main!

When the fierce tempest's strife was o'er
Men gathered to the rocky shore,
And there—pale victims to the storm—
Lay many a fair and manly form;
The ice their winding sheet—their bed
The rocks which feel the mighty tread
Of untold ages, as they sweep
Like torrent rushing o'er the steep!

As they bend above the dead,
Solemn and slow were the words they said,
For the sleepers were their own!
And many a dear, familiar face,
Unmarked by the billow's rude embrace,
By the dawning light was shown!

Welcome the wanderers home!
They have swept o'er the ocean's glassy breast—
They have found the port where the weary rest—
They have ceased on earth to roam!

Hollow their narrow bed!
Let the moan of the wild, unceasing wave,
Sweep over the meek and grassy grave,
Where slumbers now the dead!

For them no feast was spread
In banquet-hall! No festal song, no dance,
Or torches flashing back in beauty's glance,
Were needed for the dead!

Sadder than partings oft
Are the strange meetings which the heart must bear!
But when we dread the chillness of despair,
Faith shows her wing aloft!

THE SPRING.

THIS is one of those subjects which seem inexhaustible. Much has been said and sung, about Spring, and yet the theme remains interesting. Spring may come with all her beauties; the youthful year may dance gaily in her flowery and verdant robes, to the music of the spheres, but if there were no observing eye, no listening ear, in vain would be the waking of nature from her wintry sleep. The beneficent Creator has decreed that there shall be sensitive beings to enjoy the earthly glory; nor is man alone blessed in the resurrection of the dead year. Myriads of insects come forth to sport in the rays of the warm sun, to wander among the flowers, and sport upon the green leaves. The cattle, confined during the winter, now burst forth from their enclosures to bound wildly over the fields and snuff the free air, fragrant with perfumes. The tender grass peeps forth, beautiful in its early green. The wild flowers spangle the heather, and invade the paths. The song of birds is heard in the neighboring wood, and the marsh is vocal when evening smiles from the stars through her dewy tears. The great willow has put on her green robe, and, drooping low, weeps for the early flowers which have already withered around her.

One of the finest situations, which citizens can conveniently repair to for enjoyment, is Boston Common. The long—very long walks, between rows of spreading trees—the plats of grass; the variation of hill and hollow; and the immense size of the grounds, together with the sheet of water in the centre, are calculated to create a momentary surprise in the mind of a stranger. The Park of New York is not so rural, but is thronged with passengers hurrying along the paths on business. On the other hand, the Common is so large, that you may find a spot in it, where you can enjoy your own reflections in peace. The New York Park, however, in the very centre of business, with its immense fountain, is a grand feature in the city of New York; but if you would be alone, you must leave the city behind you, and then if you run the gauntlet safely through the host of snarling dogs and ruffian-like people who infest the suburbs, you may, after a time, gain the pleasant fields and woods of the country. But that is a long walk for a Summer's day. Therefore, Boston Common is certainly a great blessing to the citizens of Boston.

But we need not linger here. The pleasant grounds belonging to cities cannot compare with the open country. The charms of New England scenery are remarkable. The healthiness of the atmosphere is well known; and a Summer spent in almost any part of the country, is delightful. In wandering abroad in the interior, the heart aches to see so much beauty in solitary places, where the foot of man seldom passes, and upon which so few eyes are permitted to gaze. A person of a romantic turn of mind might almost desire to set out on foot and travel about the country for weeks, sleeping in the woods at night, and sauntering, by day, among the natural bowers, the woods, and the long grass, occasionally gathering berries, and stopping to pick up a plump and golden-colored peach which the wind of the past night has blown into the highway.

The cattle move slowly on the hills. The geese rush from the gravelly bank, and glide upon the bosom of the silvery lake, screaming over the face of the waters, like the water wraith, at the approach of a passenger.

Man who hath been jostled by the crowd—tortured by the pride of thy fellows, or stung by ingratitude, leave the busy mart and come forth where the waters curl over the clean pebbles, and the green grasshopper, and insect with silver wings, fly in at the window. Come out from the throng of busy and emulous men, to 'meet the sun upon the upland lawn,' and commune with the spirit of mercy sent forth over all the earth. The squirrel takes his daring leap above thee, while the waters tinkle in the cleft rock beneath thee. The zephyr stirs the green leaf, and the fragrant wild rose opens, filled with dew.

Yon far off cottage in the dale is the only visible habitation. The tall corn that surrounds his dwelling, and waves its tassels in the wind, is ripening in the sun, and will be securely housed before the blasts of Autumn come up chill from the North. The large tin pans shine in the sun, and the flat door-stone, fringed with long grass, is without a stain. That golden-haired lass, who now may be seen crossing the adjacent hill, is the presiding genius of the cottage, and beneath her hands every thing wears the aspect of neatness and regularity. The door yard, though surrounded by an old mossy stone wall, is well supplied with the fairest flowers; and the lilac bush under the window is rife with sweetness in the time of flowers. There the nightingale loves to sing at silent eve, and by her song is the maiden lulled to her slumbers. These scenes are a balm for the anxious and fretted mind, and reprove the madness of superstition. It is only in the turmoil of business, where human passions rage—where envy darts her stealthy glance, and avarice hugs her ill gotten treasures—that the dark imaginings of the bigot conjure up preternatural horrors, and that man conceives the idea of ruling his fellow man with a rod of iron. The scenes of harmonious nature convey a different lesson. Although the lightning may flash occasionally, and the thunder may roar, yet we know that the atmosphere is purified by these means. In days of ignorance—when men knew not why the artillery of heaven was discharged—it was supposed that the thunder was the voice of an angry deity; and Jupiter received the name of 'The Thunderer.' It was supposed that the gods lived up in the air, and as the phenomena of thunder and lightning were unknown, they were attributed to the immediate act of the gods. Thus Brutus is made to say:

'When Marcus Brutus grows so covetous
To lock such rascal counters from his friends,
Be ready, gods, with all your thunderbolts,
Dash him in pieces.'

But history will inform us that, notwithstanding all the noise and commotion produced by thunder and lightning, they have been harmless when compared with the raging of human passions. Nature is sufficiently well ordered—let us command ourselves.

As thunder and lightning were heard and seen in the heavens, and as the heavens were supposed to be the residence of the gods, therefore the inference was drawn that God was terrible and revengeful—that he would come in the clouds of heaven, with thunderings and with lightnings, taking vengeance upon his adversaries! It was not very difficult to make the ignorant and the timid believe this; and thus ambitious and designing men obtained the rule over them. It will be observed that among low and ignorant people, the custom of frightening children to make them obedient, to a great degree, obtains. After making people believe that God was a terribly revengeful being, the next step was for the designing to persuade them that they had power to unlock the doors of heaven—to forgive sins, to reconcile their fellows to this angry God; and finally to free them from a place of temporary torment, called Purgatory. This contrivance proved exceedingly profitable to the priests, and vast sums were amassed, by taking advantage of the tender concern which is felt for our deceased friends.

Science, by exploring the secrets of nature and her laws, has shown that thunder and lightning are no more the voice of God than any other display of his power and beneficence, and that they are eminently beneficial to our race, by purifying the air which we breathe. By pursuing our researches into the laws of nature, we find that every thing is calculated for producing the greatest amount of general good. There is no exhibition of wrath or purposed vengeance. What if an earthquake has destroyed a number of lives? If the confined air had not found vent in one particular spot, it would have spread far more extensive ruin. But would those persons whom the earthquake killed have never died, had the earthquake spared them? Death occurs, sooner or later, to all men.

The bounty of the Creator is apparent on all hands; and this would be more clearly and continually recognized, if man had not sought dominion of his fellow, by the invention of dismal fables which prevent him from enjoying that which he hath. We may hope that a change is at hand; and that men will begin to understand the true nature of their existence, and the design of the Creator in his works.

THE WOOD-PATH.

BY CHARLOTTE.

AWAY in the depths of a shady wood,
Where the ring-dove nurses her tender brood,
Where the red-breast trilleth his evening hymn,
And lovers walk in the twilight dim—
Is a grassy bank, with a terrace crowned,
Where the pale, soft blossoms of Spring abound;
And the moss looks ever as bright and green
As the emerald throne of a fairy-queen.

There the gentle dews and the April showers
Whisper of love to the nodding flowers;

And a song of gratitude riseth up
From the purple bell and the golden cup.
Like jewels they shine mid the wavy grass,
And greet us with perfume whene'er we pass;
And through the long summer the bees will come,
And fill the air with their drowsy hum.

And where a sycamore's branches fling
Their pleasant shadow—a silvery spring
Comes bubbling forth from its very foot,
Half-choked in its passage by many a root;
These forming a knotted and tangled net,
O'er which like a fountain the waters jet,
And ripple along with a pleasant sound
Over the sandy and pebbled ground.

How pleasant it was in my childhood's day,
Thro' that green wood-path alone to stray,
And idly lie thro' the dreamy hours,
Lulled by the wild'wing perfume of flowers.
How oft I've leaned o'er the fountain's brink,
With my hand for a cup, of its wave to drink,
Or thrown myself by its grassy side,
To bathe my brow in its crystal tide!

O many a season has come and past,
Since through those woodlands I wandered last;
And many a mountain and vale and glen,
Have revealed themselves to my eager ken;
I have listened with awe to the ocean's roar,
When its foaming billows have lashed the shore;
But nothing can charm me where'er I roam,
Like the scenes that smile round my early home.

Though bowed with the burdens of near fourscore,
My heart is as young as in days of yore;
And every beautiful thing, I see
In earth or in heaven delighteth me.
The simplest flower that grows at my feet,
Is full of instruction divinely sweet,
And the stars that jewel the azure sky,
Are types of my spirit's high destiny.

A MIRROR FOR ALL CHURCHES.

SINCE mottoes have gone into disuse, I will even preface my sketch with an extract from Timothy Flint's 'Reminiscences of a Recent Journey,' published in the Knickerbocker when he was editor of that Magazine.

'In the whole excursion, from the green hills of the interior of New Hampshire to the limits of a sea-board side on the south shore in almost every village, we saw this same array of rival churches, where the population called for but one. We every where heard the bickering and tale bearing of mutual efforts at proselytism. The ministry, that used to be considered in this region a tie as permanent and sacred as that of wedlock, now recklessly dissolved, a circumstance strongly tending to fickleness of character. How beautiful a feature would these spires constitute in the scenery of these neat and white villages, if they did not instantly bring to our thoughts, not the influences of the gospel of peace, but struggling, rivalry, backbiting, petty contention, alienation of families, ministers forgetting the dignity of their calling in stirring up these divisions, in creeping into the houses and becoming parties to them, in a word, the breaking down of all regular worship. Strange that all this should grow out of the inculcations of the Prince of Peace!

'How were you pleased with the doings of the convention, Esquire Manning?' inquired Deacon Hammond, as they met on the morning after the adjournment of the Strafford Association.

'Why, well as a whole,' said Mr. Manning, with emphasis.

'I understand you, Esquire. I doubt not you were reminded of our conversation of last week.'

'Yes, yes,' answered Mr. Manning, in his usual brisk tone. 'Indeed, indeed, Deacon, it is a great deal to say of our minister, who, en passant, is a clever soul; but he was, at best, but a miserable libel on our taste. Now, the fact is, Deacon Hammond,' he continued, tapping Mr. Hammond lightly on the shoulder with his ungloved finger, 'our village is rapidly increasing in wealth and beauty.' And he looked complacently at his own fine mansion that stood peeping through foliage, flowers and fruit. 'Our Academy is so flourishing, and the projected seminary so promising! And then there is Col. Bennet—a village in himself wherever he goes—he was at my office last evening, and proposed taking up an acre and a half of this field of mine, for a building site, yard and garden.'

'Indeed? Well, he will be a great acquisition to our village. But are you sure, Esquire, that he will attend our meeting? He may go to the other village, Mr. Ladd is so intriguing and artful in drawing hearers.'

'Yes, yes; but I questioned Bennet on the point,—rather indirectly, 'tis true—yet I am convinced from his answers that he will favor us. Report says he is very liberal in his donations wherever he takes.'

'He is! Well do close a bargain with him, Esquire, even if it is not for your immediate advantage,—I mean your pecuniary advantage; for you will be helping our common cause.' He assumed a look of great sanctity as he added, 'God forbid that I should wish Col. Bennet to settle among us, and join our fold solely because he is rich. This, independent of its bearing on the Redeemer's kingdom, if weighed in a balance, must be found wanting. But it is only by means of wealth, Esquire Manning, that we can build and repair our meeting houses, pay our preachers, and send the gospel to the heathen. Therefore wealth is desirable.'

'Oh! yes; most assuredly, Deacon. And some sacrifices, even of conscience, may be justifiable to this end.'

Mr. Hammond did not dare assent to so much, but he answered with a look that he meant should be very intelligible. 'Pray what is this Col. Bennett's occupation?' he inquired.

'Going largely into speculations of different kinds and failing, I believe,' answered Mr. Manning, laughing.

'Ha! and he finds it very profitable, does he?'

'So report says. The fact is, he is a very Shylock, except when it will suit his interests to play the Howard.'

'Well, we should overlook this failing of his; and forgive that we may ourselves be forgiven.'

'Oh, certainly! Yes, yes; you are always right, Deacon. Now I think of it, how is it with Farnum?'

'I have heard nothing from him since he withdrew our fellowship. Oh, he is irreclaimable; and it is worse than waste of time to dally with him when there is so much for the christian to do.'

'Certainly, Deacon. But some of the church think otherwise. Mr. Curtis called at my house this morning. His tone was rather lofty and decided for him, a mere plebeian in the church. He talked of the injury that would be likely to fall on his moral character, from such severity; contended that Farnum was less guilty than Deacon Bachelder who owns the store, and Mr. Mason, who tempted him when he knew his former appetite for it, and his inability to bear unharmed even the smallest quantity. He said that Mr. Mason drank more than Farnum; and insisted that the decision be reconsidered by the church, and that his expulsion be pro tempore instead of final. Rather high toned, Deacon. He was so urgent that I could not withhold my promise to assist him. I have fulfilled it, ergo no more of Farnum. The summer term of our institution commences next Wednesday, does it not, Deacon?'

'Yes; and I am delighted by its encouraging prospects.'

'Yes, yes, reasonably so. Indeed our new principal is quite a magnet. He brings half his old pupils from Dumner; and such is his reputation about here, that they will flock in from all quarters.'

'Yes; applications are being made on all hands for board. Dr. Adams has written to Mr. Lane, asking him to secure places for eight ladies in some pious, well regulated family of our order. I heard of the application, called on Mr. Lane, and offered to accommodate them. There was positive insult in his answer,—he had thought of applying to Mr. Curtis. Now you know, and Mr. Lane must have known, that Mr. Curtis' is not at all the place.'

'Yes, yes, Deacon, you are right.'

'He finally yielded; but I shall not so easily forgive him, when I have done so much for him and the church.'

'Yes; made yourself a pillar,—decidedly a corner stone,' said Mr. Manning, bowing. 'Well, well, let us consider the subject, Deacon,' he added in a low confidential tone. 'Just cast your eye round on our beautiful village. Think of the policy of attempting to secure Col. Bennet's patronage. Think of this institution, which will soon be filled with intelligent young males and females, from every part of New England. And then,' he added, laying his hand on the Deacon's shoulder, 'then just think of Mr. Lane, as he comes before us sabbath after sabbath, with his namby-pamby, "twice-told tales," delivered in his monotonous, obsolete style of gesture and pronunciation. Really, Deacon, 'tis too much.'

'Yes; 'tis contrary to scripture,' said the Deacon, huffily. 'For we are commanded to "put apples of gold in pictures of silver."'

'Ha, ha! apt upon my honor, Deacon,' said Mr. Manning, laughing, and turning half round on his heel. 'Ha! we have, instead, wooden nutmegs in pictures of gold; ha, ha.'

'I don't intend to be uncharitable in my dealings with Mr. Lane; God forbid. But duty to the church, and to him, too, requires that we remove him, if possible.'

'Certainly, Deacon; there can be no doubt of it.'

'I feel sorry to part with him,' pursued the Deacon, 'for he has been with us a long time. But, Esquire, he is worn out.'

'Ha! yes; literally used up.'

'And duty demands that we give him up.'

'Yes; and en lieu, attach Herbert, Morse, Bryant, or some other sun in the theological world equally attractive and brilliant. I will double my donation, if necessary.'

'And mine shall be quadrupled, if our cause demands it. And we must be up and doing. We shall meet sturdy opposition from some of the church. But this must be overruled by zealous argument, and by clinging to what we believe to be right.'

'Yes, this seems necessary. Our house needs remodelling; the pulpit needs new drapery, and the aisles new carpets. You know, Deacon, you know how I am involved politically. My friends expect me to be a successful candidate for the senatorial office at the next election. Do not infer, Deacon, that I am an office-seeker. I am not; but I do not wish to baffle the projects of my party; and to avoid this, I must often occupy a neutral ground, when I would, under other circumstances, be most active. Now, Deacon, I go decidedly in favor of Mr. Lane's removal; but this must be between you and me; for if I come out openly, I shall offend many influential men of my party, lose my election, and thus disappoint my party. You have no such obstacles; and, so, as Mr. Lane has said every sabbath these twenty years, you can "come out boldly, and let the world know which side you are on."'

'Ah, Esquire Manning, I cannot admit that politics should lead you to neglect your duty to your church and your God,' said the Deacon, with more seriousness than he had before worn. It had the desired effect on Mr. Manning. He feared the loss of the Deacon's favor; and hazarded an attempt to secure it, by promising to work around the edges; to throw out such insinuations here and conjectures there, as could not fail of accomplishing their object. Deacon Hammond was to visit those not irretrievably attached to Mr. Lane, obtain their meed of approval, or at least, acquiescence; and then, as a friend, inform him of prevailing dissatisfaction, and consequent desires of obtaining a new preacher. He was to counsel him, as he valued his reputation and usefulness, to withdraw upon some plausible pretext—say, desires for change of scene, or for a more extensive field, or for the leisure that would be afforded by a repetition of old sermons. In all the cunning and baseness of selfishness and charlatanry was the plan laid and executed. There were some above infection; but by far the greater part of the church yielded to their machinations. Among these, were not a few of the charitably disposed.

'Mr. Hall, did it seem to you that Mr. Lane was not preaching so well as usual to-day?' asked Mrs. Hall on the next sabbath evening.

'Yes, he was uncommonly dull—tedious beyond endurance. As the Deacon says, we owe it to our cause to provide ourselves with a better preacher.'

'Why, Mr. Hall! I didn't think you would forsake Mr. Lane—especially at this time, when he needs all that his friends can do for him.'

'But as Esquire Manning said, he is so unpopular and dull.'

'Ah! I see what Mr. Lane's enemies have done for you, and I feel what they have done for myself. I have always liked Mr. Lane; but to-day I could think of nothing but the Deacon's "stupid, unpopular, worn out, &c." He seemed to have undergone an entire change; but all the fault lies in myself. I know he is not so spirited, so much engaged as he was ten years ago. But how can he be? He has nothing in the world to encourage him. Then every heart in the church loved him, and every hand helped him on. Now more than half of the influential members are drawing against him. The rest go with him, 'tis true, but more like the burden of Bunyan's "Christian," than any thing else. He is poorly paid, insultingly opposed in almost all his measures by the arbitrary Deacon, taught by him in his church, and even his domestic duties, when he ought to be his teacher. How can he be otherwise than dull in such a situation? Poor man! I pity him from my heart, he has always been so kind and fatherly. And Mr. Hall, how could we have borne all our troubles without his advice and prayers?'

She covered her face and was silent. Her thoughts with dear ones who had passed away,—back with them at the dread hour when they lay before her in death, and when, in her agony, she would gladly have pillowed her aching head with theirs to the sleep that knows no waking. Then Mr. Lane had hovered about her like an angel of mercy, bringing 'the oil of joy for mourning and the garments of praise for the spirit of heaviness.' She felt humbled in the dust by a consciousness of ingratitude; and wept like a child. Mr. Hall attempted to soothe her. He talked of the interests of the church, and of Mr. Lane's growing infirmities—physical and mental. His manner was full of tenderness and affection. To these Mrs. Hall yielded, at last.

With tearful eyes, trembling lips, and a bursting heart, Mr. Lane gave his farewell to his tenderly loved flock. He had guarded them long and faithfully. He had mourned with those that mourned, and rejoiced with those that rejoiced. He came among them when wider doors were open for him on every hand; when they were few in numbers and scanty in means,—at the impulse of his ever benevolent, self-sacrificing spirit, he came among them. He healed existing animosities, and levelled barriers which prevented kindly intercourse among neighbors of different creeds, until creeds were forgotten. He had grown old in their service. His head had become white and bald, but this only rendered its bold and striking outline more definable. His eye had lost a portion of its fire, but it was full of benevolence and fatherly affection. His voice was slightly tremulous, but it was rich with the melody of a grateful, happy spirit. Its mellow sweetness suited the themes on which it loved to linger—love—love to God and man. His society loved him, but they loved popularity more; and more of this they hoped would follow in the train of a meteor. Alas, for poor human nature! forever acknowledging its affinity to dust, in its servile homage to the opinions of fellow worms.

"Why art thou cast down, O my soul? Why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise him who is the light of my countenance and my God," exclaimed Mr. Lane, aroused, at length, from a long, sad fit of reverie, by the affectionate attentions of his wife. He clasped his hands, and raised his eyes to heaven in supplication. "Thy will—thy will, O God, be done," said he, in a tone of resignation and peace that thrilled the heart of his wife. 'I will write to my brother now, my love,' said she, after a long consultation upon their trials and future prospects. 'You know he has great influence, and it will all be exerted in our favor.'

She wrote accordingly; and in four days received a return from her brother, in behalf of the church convened, urging Mr. Lane's immediate acceptance of a vacancy in his parish. The letter concluded, 'We have just rid ourselves of a very Burchard, Mr. Hervey. We have all had our surfeit of rhodomontade; and are longing for the gospel that bringeth peace. To the wishes of the church, my dear brother, we add our earnest and affectionate entreaties.'

'Brethren, this gentleman is just what we need in this village,' said Deacon Hammond, when they were considering the expediency of settling Mr. Hervey. 'Devoted, of great learning and talent, we should not allow such a prize to slip. True his demands are rather exorbitant, but he is a revenue in himself.'

The prudent had many objections, but these were overruled; and Mr. Hervey was duly installed. Then came the routine which naturally follows such events brought about by such measures,—the lauding the new minister to the skies; remodelling the church; purchasing an elegant bible for Mr. Hervey, and silver service for his wife; then a 'series of meetings,' which, under the direction of such a man as Hervey, could not fail of becoming the prolific source of 'rivalry, struggling, backbiting, petty contention, alienation of families, ministers forgetting the dignity of their calling, in stirring up these divisions, by creeping into the houses and becoming parties to them, in a word, the breaking down of all regular worship.' Those, who, though differing from that church in belief, had hitherto walked among them as brethren, were estranged, organized a second church, built a rival house, purchased a better organ and bell, and managed to appropriate some of the best voices from the first choir. Such scenes are more appalling to the sincere, humble christian, than the withering sirocco to the traveller in the desert,—such a death of piety, such an utter prostration of moral strength and beauty, attend them. Mrs. Hall and Mrs. West, although members of opposing churches, were still friends.

'All this seems like a dismal dream to me,' said Mrs. Hall.

'And one from which there is no hope of awaking,' answered Mrs. West. 'O that we had kept Mr. Lane! how happy we were with him!'

'Yes; I am bewildered when I think of the change in this village since he left. Every thing looks dark and fearful. Friends that I loved as I did myself, pass me without notice,—even my brother's wife never calls on me. Oh, how thankful I should feel to go to a wilderness! I have urged Mr. Hall to sell. But, although he regrets the division nearly as much as I do, he feels more anxious for his cause; and labors constantly for its prosperity.'

She strove in vain to suppress a gush of painful feeling. Mrs. West could not whisper 'peace, peace, when there was no peace;' and she sat buried in gloomy thought.

'Mrs. Ames, did you know that the chorister of the other choir is attempting to smuggle our leader on the air?' inquired Miss Mills.

'I guessed as much, for I saw him go into her father's just at dark last evening; and though I watched a long time, I didn't see him come out. Now don't you tell of it, Mary, but I sent Judith in to pretend that I wanted to borrow their scales. She said all were in the kitchen but Holmes and Maria. She could hear them talking and laughing in the sitting room, but couldn't understand what they said. They say Mr. Anson has called there several times of late.'

'So I heard, and you see, Mrs. Ames, if she don't go. But if she does, some stories about her will creep out, or I miss my guess.'

'They ought to. But we will wait, perhaps she won't go.'

'If she does, she is an ungrateful creature as ever lived, when we have given her so much.'

'La, she would say as Sarah Norton did, I suppose, that the other society gave as much as half. But she will be as sorry as Sarah is. They say she cries half of her time. Well, these stories about her would never have got out, if she had staid in our seats.'

'I gave her a piece of my mind, I'll tell you, and I haven't called there since, and shan't if I live to be as old as Methuselah. But do you know just what these stories are about, Sarah? A great many have asked me, and I couldn't tell.'

'La, no, I don't know exactly what they are; I never could find out; but they are bad enough, I'll warrant you.'

'Yes, that's what I told them. But I must go,' she added, rising. 'I shall call on our folks all along, and give them a hint of what is going on, on the other side of the road.'

'So do; I think it your bounden duty. Good morning.'

Mr. Abbot attended one meeting, his wife the other; and the respective attendants of each, were loud and vehement in their invectives against the offending party. Mrs. Hall and Mrs. West contended that there was no difference in the societies, except in their belief or disbelief of a few non-essentials. They were alike governed, almost completely, by a spirit of bitterness, sectarianism and prejudice, instead of 'the mild laws of the Prince of Peace.' It is a fortunate circumstance that such a spirit, in its impetuosity, rapidly exhausts itself. In a few months, there was a hush, a stillness, pervading the moral atmosphere at Alston, not unlike that in the natural world, which follows some tremendous convulsion. Energies had been exerted, fears had been excited, and imaginations warped to their utmost extent; and were now left to tremble into rest. But it was a rest the inebriate knows after a long season of intoxication,—a rest fearfully infectious to all the warm and benevolent impulses of the heart. Some, ay, many of both churches, had passed the trial unscathed. Theirs was the still, small voice, which, like that of conscience, had been unheard amid the din of sectarian warfare. Now Mr. Hervey had spent himself. He had exhausted his vocabulary of epithets of endearment, exhortation and denunciation; and was prodigiously dull, Mrs. Ames and Miss Mills said. And, indeed, he was. His was a temperament that acted only when under the influences of extraordinary excitement. He was a meteor, whose time of rest and extinction are simultaneous. Complaints, heard at first only in whispers, became loud and more loud, until they reached his ear; and he eagerly caught them as apologies for leaving Alston.

In the mean time, the other society, deprived, in the coldness and indifference of the first church, of their stimulus to action, became negligent in their attendance on the ministries of the sanctuary. The young and gay preferred vastly, a stroll by the river, or the perusal of a favorite author, to a dull bit of a sermon. The miserly, who never would have consented to the deposition of a farthing by way of rearing their house, but for the sake of being revenged on Mr. Hervey and his supporters, could not now endure the sight of their costly edifice, not in sober reality worth a fraction. Some of this class were among the most influential members of the society, and their vote for the sale and appropriation of their house for town conventions, was not to be disregarded. Mrs. West, Mrs. Hall, and other kindred spirits, were in favor of this plan; for if it were carried, friend could again meet friend under the same roof; and it would again be to them 'none other than the house of God, and the very gate of heaven.' At first, the scheme was suggested as something impracticable—to be talked of, yet never realized. But it at length became the object of a meeting of the two churches, to consider the expediency of the measure. Deacon Hammond was opposed to it entirely and eternally. The scenes through which he had recently passed, had not been destitute of hardening effects on his soul. It was more than ever, the seat of unnatural hostility to all who differed from him in doctrine. Esquire Manning had 'weighed the pro and con, but still remained in statu quo.' The utility of the measure was still a question with him, and must be at present; for his election was by no means secure. Mrs. Ames and Miss Mills would never attend meeting in Alston again, if the proposed union took place. They were sure they fairly hated one half of the other congregation. They certainly would never hear Maria Perkins and Sarah Norton sing in the house of God, for they detested mockery. In vain Mrs. Hall remonstrated, they remained sturdily inflexible. But fortunately for the peace of Alston, there were redeeming spirits, counteracting influences abroad. Strong in the might of benevolent intention, they persevered against the tide of prejudice and scandal; and at last, effected a sale of the old house, and joint ownership of the new. Rev. Mr. Adams was invited to their desk, 'because he was so much like Mr. Lane.' Their choice was a happy one. Mr. Adams was a judicious, clear sighted man, energetic and persevering in his endeavors to do good. This fortunate, and rather rare combination, amply qualified him for the arduous task before him. The wandering from the fold were to be reclaimed, alienated families and friends conciliated, the proud Pharisee humbled and the poor publican encouraged. Envy and jealousy, with their attendant, scandal, were winding their way about the village, coiling a luckless victim here, and fixing their envenomed fangs there. The fruits of the gospel, love, joy, peace, long-suffering—where were they?

'Alas! where are they?' said Mr. Adams to his wife, on their return after a round of calls.

'Sister Margaret would say, 'Fled to brutish beasts, and men have lost their reason, doubtless,' said Mrs. Adams. 'You have much to encourage you in the influences the Halls, Wests, and Nortons are exerting. They will be felt, and all on the side of piety.'

'True, my dear; there is much reason to hope. We will trust our heavenly Father, seek his guidance, and I feel that all will yet be well.'

Many and severe were his trials, but he contended faithfully against them. Deacon Hammond was not to be reclaimed. The Paria had come in with the Bramin, and reconciliation was not to be talked of. Esquire Manning lost his election, and in a fit of spleen sold his seat to Mr. Adams, and removed to the West.

'Rejoice with me, my sister,' said Sarah Norton, on entering Mrs. Hall's sitting room. 'Our moral incubus is gone.'

'You must mean Deacon Hammond. Has he indeed gone to Vermont?'

'Yes. He told pa last evening that he should never set foot on Alston ground again. He acknowledged his motive in going there. His friend wrote him that his church had succeeded in putting down all opposition in the other churches in that town; and so there were none to molest or make them afraid. Look out, Mrs. Hall, see if it is not pleasanter than ever before.'

'Oh no, my dear, see those clouds,' answered Mrs. Hall, smiling, and kissing Sarah's cheek.

'Well, I am sure Alston never looked so pleasant to me before. Every body seems so cheerful! Mrs. Curtis has not spoken to me before since the schism. To-day she beckoned me to her window, as I was passing. She shed tears when she asked my forgiveness; but before we parted, laughed and chatted like her own dear self again. Oh, I never was so happy.'

'SLEEP. There is perhaps no solitary sensation so exquisite as that of slumbering on the grass or hay, shaded from the hot sun by a tree, with the consciousness of a fresh but light air running through the wide atmosphere, and the sky stretching far overhead on all sides.'

'LIFE IS LIKE AN APRIL DAY.'

BY CHARLOTTE.

LIFE is like an April day
Changing ever—
Friendships blossom and decay,
Fond hearts sever!

Sorrow, clad in robes of gray,
Mocketh gladness;
Sunbeams come to chase away
Clouds of sadness!

The smile is followed by the tear,
Sunshine by show'rs—
The bridal couch becomes a bier,
Love fades like flow'rs!

Genius weaves its thrilling lay—
Music gushes—
Grief will blight the wreath of bay,—
Sorrow crushes!

With dewy flowers, her locks of gold
Beauty braideth—
But ah! she loves not to be told,
Beauty fadeth!

Ay! life's like an April day,
Yet we cherish
Hopes—that like the buds of May Bloom and perish!

DISCOURSES FOR COMMUNION SEASON, UPON TRAITS IN THE CHARACTER OF CHRIST.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

DISCOURSE II.—THE SERENITY OF JESUS.

'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.'

LUKE xxiii. 46.

THE Trait in the Character of our Savior to which I propose to call your attention at this time, is what I shall term the SERENITY of Jesus. I mean by this the calm and self-confident manner in which he ordinarily pursued his way, and taught his Truths, and wrought his works. This characteristic must have struck you as it has me. You must feel, when you reflect upon it, that Christ possessed, in a remarkable manner, this calmness, this self-possession—in one word, this serenity. Those who would undermine in a covert manner all the essentials of Christianity, yet respect its Founder, adding, perhaps, the remark that he was something of an Enthusiast. But looking at facts with the most sincere reverence, I do not think that this term, in the sense which they attach to it, can be applied to the Savior. There was in him very little of what we call excitement. There was life, deep, holy life, that flowed from every action, that warmed in every word, and went down into the heart with quickening power. In every teaching that he gave, there was a spirit which should stir men dead in their worldliness, and lost in their transgression—a vivifying spirit, that should breathe over this great valley of vision, until the bleached trophies of moral death, the skeleton hosts of sin, should rise, and become living men—a regenerating spirit, that in its meek and bloodless mission, should outlast the sword and the fire-scourge, and conquer the world by Love, and cover the desolate places of humanity with green harvests of eternal life. All these were in Jesus and his teachings—Life, vigor, regeneration. But there was not, I say, what is commonly understood by excitement. There was no phrensy, no tumult, no fanaticism—all was calm, deep, and even, like the passing of a star through heaven.

When we picture Jesus in our minds, we see no fitful, violent manner—no contorted features, no phrensyed gestures—all is dignified and harmonious. The face is sweet and calm, as though his communion was always with Love and with God—as though to his vision these material veils, these time-barriers, were all melted away, and though upon earth, he was walking all the while in heaven, surrounded by associations and perceiving objects that belong only to that holy clime. This, I say, is to us the most familiar picture of Jesus—whether he sits upon the mountain with the green leaves clustered above him, the far heaven looking through, and the tones of his voice melting and breaking over the great multitude in waves of melody, yet full of vast, eternal truth—whether he stands on the shore of Galilee, or walks its crested bosom—whether he speaks to the raging tide, or rebukes the spirits that rage more fiercely—whether he stretches out his hand to the diseased, or argues with the bigoted, or communes with those whom he had called to be his Apostles. In each, in all of these scenes, still there is the same calm countenance, the same serene deportment.

Let us select two or three prominent instances in our Savior's Life, in which this serenity was manifested. Take the night and storm-scene on the sea of Galilee. This sheet of water is surrounded by high mountains, through whose gorges the winds rush with fearful power, creating violent and dangerous tempests. Jesus had embarked with his disciples in a frail vessel, a mere fishing-boat, out upon this uncertain lake. As was his wont, he had been engaged all day, in healing the diseased, and teaching the anxious people, and now, yielding to mortal fatigue, he had laid himself down in the hinder part of the vessel for a little rest. Calmly he fell asleep with the fresh wind blowing over his brow, knowing no fear, and disturbed by no evil. Suddenly, the wind came roaring through these mountain passes, ploughing the sea into broken furrows, and lifting up and dashing to and fro that tiny bark whose ribs were like glass to the angry storm. The startled disciples rush to their feet, staggering with every plunge of the vessel, until, in the extremity of fear they cry out—'save, Master, we perish!' What a contrast was there between those terror-stricken features—those writhing, reeling men—and that sleeping face, pillowed upon the very bosom of the Father, conscious if there was calm that God sent it, and if there was storm that He controlled it. He awoke. There was no excited or hurried gesticulation. He arose, admonished them for their lack of Faith, rebuked the winds and the sea, and, in the expressive language of the Evangelist—"there was a great calm." A calm which only mirrored that which dwelt in the soul of Jesus.

Take another instance. Upon a certain day, Jesus was teaching. A great multitude had gathered around him. Pharisees and Doctors of the Law, notwithstanding their bigotry and their pride, had assembled from every town of Galilee and Judea, and from Jerusalem, curious to hear the strange Teacher, who claiming to be the Messiah, assumed such a simple garb and spoke of such a mysterious Kingdom—and the common people, who 'heard him gladly,' were there, to catch the word of truth for which their souls hungered, to listen to the precepts that warmed and encouraged their hearts, and to gaze upon the beneficent Face of him to whom the sorrowful and suffering never appealed in vain. In the midst of our Savior's Teachings, a group approached bearing upon a couch a man sick with the palsy, anxious for the healing power of the Great Prophet. But the crowd was so dense that they could not pierce through to the spot where Jesus stood. So they took the light mat with the sick man upon it, and bore him by the outside stairway to the level summit of the house. Shifting the awning that covered the court-yard, they let the man down through, and placed him before Jesus, in the midst of the multitude. 'Man,' said the Savior, 'thy sins are forgiven thee.' There was no hesitation evinced by him upon assuming so great authority. It was said calmly, with few and simple words. He who spoke them evidently knew that he had power to forgive sin. But it was not what the multitude expected him to do, and they looked around one upon another, with astonished faces. The subtle scribe began to cavil, and the indignant Pharisee broke out—'Who is this that speaketh blasphemies?—who can forgive sins but God alone?' The great mass, no doubt, were silent and breathless, some angry, like the Pharisees, some enraged at the boldness of the Nazarene, some eager to see what the wonderful Teacher would do next. All were disturbed but Christ. Calmly he had uttered those words 'Thy sins are forgiven thee'—from a serene, self-possessed spirit they had proceeded. He saw their thoughts, read the various emotions that disturbed them, and added—'Why reason ye in your hearts?

Whether is easier to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Rise up and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of Man hath power upon earth to forgive sins,' said he, and as he spoke he turned to the sick man—'Arise, take up thy couch and go unto thine house'. Instantly, as though the words addressed to him came from the trumpet of resurrection, the poor invalid, who but now lay withered and helpless with the palsy, started up, rolled together his light bed, and departed, his lips full of gushing praises. The people were amazed, they were stricken with fear, they cried out—'We have seen strange things to-day'. But all had come from the Savior as a natural effort of the will—of one who was confident that he had the power to forgive sin, or to restore the sick; and in the midst of that agitated, wonder-smitten crowd, he alone was calm, like a sunbeam amid the dark and troubled waters.

Consider the last scenes of our Savior's Life, which afford several striking instances of his serenity. He had just finished his Prayer and agony in the garden. 'Rise,' said he, to the torpid and grieving disciples, 'Behold he is at hand that doth betray me.' There has been a rush of bitter agony over his spirit—and I shall allude to this fact again—but now it is Jesus again—Jesus as all along we have been accustomed to see him, calm and self-possessed, looking into the very face of that dreadful death that now approaches him. A light glimmers through the foliage of Gethsemane, and its beam grows broader and brighter, before the tramp of disciplined feet, and the clash of weapons. A miscellaneous crowd of servants and soldiery, of Priests and officers, breaks from the darkness before him. From this one advances, apparently with a friendly intent. It is Judas, the dark, traitorous Judas, tainted with a bloody bribe, and already, as it were, stained with the death of innocence. 'Hail Master,' says the hypocrite, giving him a kiss—a fatal kiss. No burst of anger comes from Jesus, though he knows the traitor's purpose, and reads with his piercing eye every intent of that black and selfish heart. 'Friend,' says he, 'wherefore art thou come?' Calmly does he meet even him, who had gone from the communion of kindness and the feast of love, to bargain for his blood, and who has used the most sacred symbol of affection as an instrument of betrayal. The soldiers advance and seize Jesus. He lifts up no indignant voice—he offers no resistance. But Peter, rash and impetuous, is moved by the feelings that influence ordinary men, and seizing in haste a sword, cuts off the right ear of a servant of the High Priest. Mark, again, the self-possession of Jesus. 'Put up thy sword again in its place,' says he, 'suffer ye thus far,' and stretching out his hand he heals the wound of one who was ready to slay him.

But further trials await him. He is nearly deserted by his disciples. He is borne to the palace of the High Priest. He is confronted by false witnesses. Calmly he bears it all. While others would have yielded to the impulse of indignation, or drooped in the agony of fear, he stands serene, awaiting the end, feeling that this too is his appointed work. He gives an answer to the High Priest. Instantly a rough hand smites him, and a savage voice exclaims, 'Answerest thou the High Priest so?' But calmly he meets the blow and returns not the insult. 'Behold the man,' oh! ye who bear his name—look at the Teacher, and see his serenity amid scenes that would stir our worst passions, or our most fearful terrors. They spit upon him, they smite him with reeds, they plait a crown and drive it upon his brow, rankling there and gashing the flesh with thorns. They sneer at him. They bow in contemptuous mockery. They robe him as if he were a maniac. Men for whom he would die, now ironically crouch before him in grave obsequiousness, now fiercely strike him with clenched hands. 'Hail, King of the Jews!' cry the taunting soldiery in the Pretorium—'Crucify him! Crucify him!' shouts the hoarse multitude in the streets. And yet that Face, that Face we love to look upon, is serene amid it all—serene amid the spitting and the smiting, when Herod sets him at naught, and Pilate scourges—serene amid the thorns that have lacerated it, and the hands that have caused it to trickle with blood.

And so that dark and awful transaction rolls on to its close. Again we see him bending beneath his Cross, pained and wearied. Women follow him, lamenting him, the Kind Teacher, the Blessed Prophet, he who perhaps had rescued from death some of those very children who clung to their arms, or laid his hands in Benediction upon them. They wept. Woman's gentler nature was touched and melted, while man denounced and slew. They wept for him—the homeless, lonely man, surrounded by his strong enemies and borne to his death. But what did Jesus? Was he agitated? Did he burst forth in weeping? No: kindly he turned to those mourning women and exclaimed—'Weep not for me, but weep for yourselves and your children'.

We come at length to the event recorded in our Text. Jesus hangs upon the Cross. The quiver of sharp agony runs over him. His lips are parched with thirst. The blood drips painfully from his wounded side. But he feels that his hour has come. The agony has passed now. And, calmly dying, he breathes his last words—'Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit'. What a close was that! How consistent this serene death with so serene a life! It is like a dying strain of heavenly music, over which a crash of thunder may have for a moment prevailed, or the fitful winds have checked, but which we feel could only issue from a Divine Source, and burst from the very fullness of a holy nature. Strange darkness is there—but we heed not that.

The rocks grind together and crash in their fall, but we hear them not. Fearfully the Temple is shaken and its great veil is rent asunder by an invisible hand. But we are near the Cross. We hear only the calm, resigned voice, that pierces the unnatural night, and rises up to Heaven—'Father into Thy Hands I commend my Spirit'.

I have thus endeavored to set before you a few instances of the serenity of Jesus. But the Trait is prominent through his whole Life. You can scarcely turn over a page of the Gospels without discovering it. But it may be said that our Savior was not always thus serene. The rebuke of the Scribes and Pharisees, the weeping at the grave of Lazarus, the agony in the garden, and the exclamation upon the Cross, may be cited as instances when this serenity was interrupted, and his nature was stirred by deep passion. But I have not said that Christ was always thus serene. I have said that serenity was a prominent trait in his character. He was serene when other men would have been troubled, serene when they would have failed with terror, serene when they would have given away to indignation, or been abashed by circumstances, or perplexed by doubts and cavils. But where this serenity failed, other traits were manifested, that equally mark the truth of our Savior's Character, and prove its greatness as well as its reality. The very trait upon which I dwelt in the first discourse,—his Tenderness—was manifested in these seasons of emotion. Christ was not a stoic, one who never felt pain, who never yielded to an emotion of nature. In this way he might have been a Teacher, but he would not have been an Exemplar and a Brother. Christ was not one who never yielded to circumstances, or regarded the occasion. In this way he might have been a miraculous Prophet, but he would not have been a tender, loving, sympathizing man. I do not say, then, that Christ was always serene, but I say that it was a leading Trait of his Life—that he possessed it when, ordinarily, it would have failed, and when he was shaken from it, it was to reveal even higher Traits, and exhibit characteristics more gentle and more dear.

The serenity of Jesus, then—let us give heed to it, my friends. Let us consider what a Life it was that led to such a calm and trustful close. That dying expression—'Father, into thy Hands I commend my Spirit,' is the result of a tranquil and holy Life. Many conflicts must be fought, many victories won, in order to triumph thus. We will not pause now to consider the causes that led to it in Christ, let us, in concluding this discourse, see what may lead to it in each one of us.

I estimate highly this serenity—serenity like that of Jesus. I value it more than I do enthusiasm, or earnest profession, or excitement, or zeal. Men are too prone in our day to look for Religion in excitement—to view it too much as an agitating sentiment.

In this view much must be said about Religion, and much of a peculiar character must be done. They must step a little out of the common track of life to be Religious, and must employ some peculiar words, or display some peculiar badge, to evince that they are so. Now this I deem to be a mistake. He who is seeking for his Religion chiefly in excitement, or manifesting it mostly in convulsive and tumultuous action, has not imbibed the full spirit and risen to the elevation of true Religion. The man of indwelling vital Religion, is likely to be a serene man, calm and trustful. His Religion has not sprung up in a night. The sunbeams have not been concentrated upon it to make it grow by hot and violent action, but gradually it has been developed in the light and air of nature, and it is prepared to meet the season of drought, or the time of cold and tempest. True Greatness in all departments of human action will commonly be found to possess this serenity. One of the characteristics of true Greatness, is repose, self-possession, confidence—not the repose of sluggishness, but of strength, of conscious inward power—not the repose of the pool, or the rock, but the repose of the oak that contains in itself an element of unfailing strength, that wrestles with the tempest and smiles in the sunshine, but that stands there, ever vigorous and full of life. * So, I say, is Religion. The truly religious man trusts God and lives in harmony with His will. So did Jesus. He had full confidence in his Father—he was One in Purpose with Him—hence his serenity. He spoke to the stony dead and knew that they would hear, because he knew that God sustained him, because in that act he was doing the will of God. He commended his spirit in his dying hour to his Father, for he knew that the Father doeth all things well. And this same trust in God—this same harmony with Him—will produce serenity in us. I do not say that we shall never be excited—I do not say that all excitements are vain. But I say that he who is chiefly looking to excitement, and to extraordinary agencies, as the source of his religious Life, is looking in the wrong direction. Let us carefully distinguish between healthful, ever-active life, and morbid excitement. All nature is full of life—yet, as a general rule, there is nothing fitful, nothing convulsive. All is calm and regular, flowing from deep and eternal laws.

Neither let us fancy that this serenity of which I have spoken, is anything like apathy, like stoicism. There are men who are sluggish and indifferent. This is not serenity. Serenity and sluggishness are

* Perhaps the credit for this illustration should be given to another—'Nature,' says Emerson, 'does not give the crown of its approbation, namely Purity, to any action, or emblem, or actor, but to one which combines both these elements; not to the rock which resists the waves from age to age, nor to the wave which lashes incessantly the rock. But the superior beauty is with the oak which stands with its hundred arms against the storms of a century and grows every year like a sapling.'

as different as are the depths of the pure and kindling heavens from the waters of the Dead Sea. The one is the result of sensual, careless, undevout custom—the other is the effect of all life's discipline, of victory over every evil passion, of the subjection of doubt and unbelief to Faith, of a nature that has risen above the dominion of its sins, to communion with and life in God. This is the source of true religious serenity—Life in God. The man who really possesses this serenity, lives and moves and has his being in that Great Source of all life's dispensations. Then he knows that all things work for good—then he spontaneously moves according to the will of Him who ruleth all. In such a man there are fervent love, deep-felt sympathy, a nature sensitive and tender—but also there are trust and hope and faith.

Strive then, my friends, for this religious serenity, this product of a calm trust in God and unison with his will. We much need it in such a world as this. We need it in our sorrows. We need to learn resignation at the death bed and the grave. Beautiful things pass away from before us. Beings in whom we had garnered up our affections, are torn from us. They stay with us awhile, and then the light grows dim in their eyes, and the tomb claims them. And disappointments break upon us—and bright hopes fade and wither—and cares perplex us; and with what shall we meet all these things? I answer, with serenity—religious serenity—serenity developed and made strong in the purifying discipline of sorrow. Oh! it is indeed 'a sublime thing, to suffer and be strong.' Nothing so evinces the power of religion, as the man who has not been driven to despair, or left to wither in pining melancholy by his griefs, but who has risen above them, made them all subservient to a religious discipline—who has grown stronger by his very afflictions. Earnestly he prayed that the cup might pass from him—but when it came, when coldly it pressed his lips, and he had to drink the bitter draught, he took it, with lifted eyes, saying, 'Father, Thy will be done!' And this is now the sentiment of his heart—'Father, thy will be done—into thy hands I commend my spirit'. Such is the sentiment that the sorrowing need—Religious serenity—the serenity of Jesus.

And in our prosperity and our joy we need this serenity. Let us meet events calmly. Let us not be over-excited by success. Let us not be led astray by wealth, or praise, or the bliss of the moment. These are to be used, but not abused. They are that we may trust in God, that we may use our means for the greatest good, that we may live for the highest end. Trusting in God, then, should we take them—acting in harmony with His will should we use them. Then we shall not be utterly cast down if they are taken from us. Serenely we received them—serenely we part with them—serenely amid all life's vicissitudes say—'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit'.

Who shall possess this serenity? Many have enjoyed it. Poor they have been, perhaps,—laboring all day with aching hands to gain a mere subsistence. Yet those who have looked into their faces have seen there a settled joy, a cheerful calm, that nothing could disturb—it was the reflection of a holy trust that burned with pure and lambent flame deep in the heart. That heart has known many trials. Buried memories are therein. It has suffered and it is scorned. It has known privation, and drank the bitterness of bereavement. It has its tender memories, its tokens of by-gone joys, its worn path-way to the tomb of some loved-one, long since gone. But its treasures are all in Heaven, and why should it not be calm? Nothing can reach them—no wave, no tempest. Serenely that man waits his appointed time, and when his hour comes a holy light breaks upon his face. Bend down your ear to catch his dying murmur. What says he? Oh! it is still the tranquil sentiment of his life—'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit'. Whether rich or poor, then, whether joyful or sad, shall not this serenity, this religious life, so calm and deep, fixed in the heart—say, shall it not be ours?

Christian friends, as ye gather around the table of our Lord, often remember this trait in his character—serenity. Yes, with many holy lessons, he has taught us to be calm and trustful—to lean on God and wait the end. Come then, oh! blessed sufferer and give us of thy Spirit. Thou who didst sleep in a rude manger, and who rode on triumphant palms—thou who didst hear God call thee excellent, and yet whom men denied—thou who didst raise the dead, and yet suffered in agony upon the Cross—in all these shifting scenes, serene and mighty; come give us of thy Spirit, that we too may live and trust—that we may calmly do our work—that we may feel that we are one with God—that when we die we too may say, 'Father, into thy hands we commend our spirits'.

A HOME-CALL.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

HOME from the greenwood come!

The tinkling waters through the mosses streaming
Upon the gray old stones o'erhung by flowers,
The yellow sunshine through the oak boughs gleaming,
Like golden clouds sent down in flaky showers—
Oh these, and countless wildering sights and voices,
Have veiled our souls in fantasies too long;
Not always in the bower the bird rejoices—
The world abroad has claims upon his song;
Has it no claims on us?

Come from the shadowy dell!

The willows shake their tassels o'er the fountain,
And send their perfume on the breeze afar;
And the mist, curling from the blue old mountain,
Goes up to wrap its mantle round the star.

So should we, bright one, shed our heart's sweet fragrance;
O'er the hot tumult of the striving crowd;
So let the musings of our wildwood vagrance,
Softened the flashing spirits of the proud;—
For we were made to bless.

Come to the open world!
Harsh fall its discords upon ears long greeted
By the soft music of the birds and rills,
Yet thither we, by myriad tongues entreated,
Must bear our love to charm away its ills.
Oh there, sweet friend, is woman's noblest duty—
There, in the homes of men, and by their hearths;
There ever lives for her the holiest beauty—
A beauty not exclusively this earth's;
So, dear one,—Shall we go?
Shirley Village, Mass.

EDOUARD AND ANTOINETTE.

A TALE OF OLDEN TIME IN FRANCE.

BY CHARLES O. P. ELLIS.

I WELL recollect the house in which I spent my infancy and boyhood. I shall never forget it. There were circumstances of romantic interest connected with my infancy and my youth—such as seldom attend the career of a human being. I do not recollect the precise time when I became an inmate of this house; but I know that it belonged to my uncle, and although I had a distinct recollection of my parents, yet I was taught to believe I should see them no more, and I, therefore, regarded my uncle and aunt as my sole protectors to whom I owed all the duty which parents can require. I was told that I must think no more of my father and mother, that they were unworthy people, and had been banished from France for some great crime, and when I inquired what that crime was, my pious relatives would cross themselves and assume a look of horror and of mystery, which served only to whet my curiosity, while, at the same time it shut out all hope of its gratification. I could not imagine what crime they had been guilty of. I remembered the countenance of my mother—mild, benevolent, yet pale and grief-worn. I remembered the gentle tones of her voice, so different from those of my aunt, whose harsh language always grated on my ear. I remembered that pale and anxious countenance, which was often present with me in my dreams. What crime could she have committed? Why was I forbidden to name her or even to think of her? Children are said to be just in their estimate of character, and certainly my uncle and aunt were not calculated to inspire me with affection.

The house in which I dwelt, with these morose relatives, was situated near the base of a lofty mountain, whose top was almost continually hidden by dark clouds. It was said by the neighboring peasantry that a hermit dwelt on the summit of this mountain. Some said that he was a very holy man who could work stupendous miracles, and who carried about with him a vial of our Savior's blood. Others said that he was a man who had been guilty of heinous crimes, and lived a life of penance, in order to conciliate the Supreme Being whom he had so deeply offended. Some pretended that they had seen an angel descend from heaven, and alight upon the top of this mountain, doubtless to hold converse with the devotee. But I perceived that the more intelligent portion of the inhabitants treated all these stories with contempt, and regarded them as the idle bugbears of ignorance and superstition. Nevertheless, they were sufficient to throw an awful mystery around the place, and nobody ever ventured to ascend this gloomy mountain to ascertain the truth.

My uncle's house was a low building, making up in length and breadth what it lacked in height, so that it contained a great number of apartments on the first floor. It was surrounded by vineyards which yielded many luscious grapes, and contributed to swell the income of my uncle, who, with all his piety, never lost sight of his worldly interests. At a short distance from the eastern porch of the house, stood a small chapel in which was a crucifix and several images of saints. My aunt spent much time here, crossing herself, kneeling and performing other ceremonies, common to the religion of the times. Whenever she came out from this chapel, her countenance was singularly forbidding, and it was then that I feared to approach her. She took great pains to instruct me in the formalities of religion, and hence they were always connected in my mind with the idea of severity, ill-nature, and self-mortification. I was taught to regard the Deity as a sovereign who could not be appeased in any other way than by the misery of his subjects; and that by tormenting ourselves in this world, we must insure happiness in that world which is to come.

These things were extremely disagreeable to me, and I could not avoid putting some questions to my uncle and aunt respecting the nature of religion and the character of God. These questions were not answered: but a look of horror, and something which they muttered to each other about my parents, led me to believe that I had given great offence. I was always treated more harshly than usual, after putting one of these questions, and was sometimes compelled to repeat over a number of prayers in Latin not a word of which I understood.

My time, therefore, passed unpleasantly enough. The cheerfulness of childhood was smothered by the moroseness of my uncle and aunt, and my growing intellect was stunted by their withering reserve and rigid enforcements. They seemed to be unwilling that I should think, and to reason was a crime.

They said they had taken me from motives of charity, and to save me from ruin, and I was soon led to believe that my proscribed parents had not assented to this benevolent movement on their part. My parents had undoubtedly left the country in haste, and I fell into the hands of these relatives by accident. But what was the crime of those parents? why were they obliged to flee to save their lives? In vain I asked these questions. My uncle and aunt said they had been dreadfully culpable. I was not satisfied. The standard by which they judged of human guilt and innocence was very different from mine. They estimated people according to their amount of religious zeal, without regard to their moral conduct.

On a certain occasion a couple of friends came to my uncle's, and in the afternoon I found one of them in the garden lying in an arbor in a state of intoxication. As I had seen my uncle throw a bucket of water upon the gardener when he was in a similar condition, I thought it an act of mercy to do so to bring the priest to his senses. But soon after I had done it, I found the difference, and was doomed to a severe penance, till the evil one should be driven out of me. I was placed in a rude part of the building, and left much exposed to the chill of the night air, without bed or bedding. However, weariness soon overcame me, and I fell asleep on the floor.

When I awoke at daylight, I was surprised to find that some person had visited me during the night. I was completely covered from the cold by several clothes, and liniment had been applied to the bruises I had received. A cup of wine stood near my head. I had scarcely drank the reviving liquid, when my uncle and aunt came into my rude apartment to see if I was able to endure farther punishment. They started upon seeing the way in which I had been provided for, and angrily demanded who had supplied me with those things. I told them I knew as little about it as they did. They then hastily examined the robes which had been thrown over me, the drinking cup, and the ointment which had been applied to my bruises. After they had done this, they looked at each other with wondering admiration. They agreed that no one living in the neighborhood could have done the things which had been done for me: the clothes were not such as were used by the peasants, and the drinking cup was of a fashion entirely different from those used by the natives. They walked quietly away and left me. In about an hour they returned again, with the intemperate father, the other having gone alone to a neighboring town. The priest examined the articles which had been left with me, and questioned me closely on the subject. I could give him no satisfaction. He then assumed a mysterious look, and, crossing himself, told my uncle and aunt that I had been visited by my guardian angel; and he insinuated that this was not the first miracle which had been performed through his agency!

'Yes,' cried my aunt, 'if the holy father had not been in our house, this wonderful miracle would never have been performed'. I was then commanded to get upon my knees and thank Father Pierre for the interposition of my guardian angel, in my behalf. Having an eye to my own interest and safety, I did as I was commanded. The priest, who appeared sincere, in the opinion which he had expressed, was now much softened toward me, and having just swallowed his morning bitters, he talked very benevolently.

He told my uncle that it would be sufficient to inflict some slight penance upon me, as I was but a child, and had probably offended through ignorance. My good aunt held up her hands with admiration at the lenity of the priest, and declared that he was altogether too merciful.

The priest went away after dinner, and I was then conveyed to a bed in a room at the end of the house next the mountain, and which was consequently dark and gloomy. On the succeeding day, I awoke with a burning fever. I begged for drink which was denied me except in very small quantities. I suffered intolerably from thirst all that day; but I was awaked at midnight by some noise near me, and perceived that a pitcher of water had been placed on a chair at the head of my bed. I seized it and drank; after which I fell into a sound sleep from which I did not awake until morning.

Upon opening my eyes, I saw my aunt standing in the door, with her hands raised at some new wonder that she had discovered. 'Where did that pitcher come from?' cried she. I told her that I was aroused at midnight by a noise near the head of my bed, and found the pitcher in a chair filled with water. She shook her head mysteriously and ran to call my uncle. He examined the pitcher, and then declared that my guardian angel had been on the premises again. He and my aunt crossed themselves most devoutly and retired. In a few moments a servant came for the pitcher, which was placed in the chapel, by the side of the cup and the celestial robes.

These visits of my guardian angel—as they were called—had a tendency to ameliorate my condition; although my aunt was evidently jealous of the favors which I received from so high a source. She, good woman, had gone through with all the exercises prescribed by her creed, had been constant at her devotions, and drilled her countenance into an expression of severity and rigid self-denial; yet no miracle had remunerated her for her trouble: while I, sinner that I was, and the son of heretics, had been taken care of by an angel, even at the moment that I was undergoing punishment for ducking a holy priest.

After my recovery, I learned that many of the neighboring gentry had called to examine my supernatural presents, and some had prostrated themselves before them in the chapel. The poor peasants were not permitted to have a glimpse of the miraculous robes and utensils, lest their presence should desecrate the temple, in which hung naked and bleeding, the God of the worshippers, on a cross like a common malefactor. But when a priest had been into the temple and touched the sacred things, the poor were permitted to kiss his hand as he came out. Oh! admirable condescension! Oh! unexampled humility!

For several days some time after these occurrences, I lay ill with a fever, but I was now attended by a nurse and a physician; since persons of quality who came to the chapel had spoken of me in very reverent terms and had prophesied that I should yet be a saint. From a regard to their own reputation, therefore, my relatives suffered me to be properly attended. But the nocturnal visitant ceased coming as soon as others bestowed upon me proper attention.

At length I was able to leave my room; and with the help of a cane, I went out into the open air. As I made my appearance in the garden, I was surprised at the conduct of the laborers. Instead of addressing me with rude familiarity, as they had been wont to do, they stepped aside as I walked along the paths, and stood gazing upon me with as much reverence and timidity as if I had been a holy pilgrim just from Jerusalem.

My strength now began rapidly to return, and I grew fond of rambling about my uncle's grounds. Sometimes I went as far as the foot of the mountain. On one of these occasions, I met a little girl, near my own age, with a basket in her hand. I was about to pass the girl with a slight bow, when she suddenly stopped, and looking fixedly at me, said with a plaintive air, 'Are you the little boy who has been so sick, and who was beaten so severely by his uncle?'

'I am the same one,' replied I.

'And are you entirely well?' inquired she.

'I am not so strong as formerly,' said I, 'but I am, every day, regaining my health'.

'I am glad of that,' cried she with much feeling, 'for I cried all day when I heard how you had been abused. What a wicked man your uncle must be!'

'Nay,' said I, 'but he is called very devout'.

'I know that very well,' replied the little girl, casting her eyes toward the ground; 'but many people are very devout, who are very wicked'.

I had never before heard this sentiment expressed. People who visited at the house of my uncle had seemed to believe that it was of little consequence what was the moral character of an individual, so that he was observant of religious forms and ceremonies, and treated ecclesiastics with reverence. I was both surprised and pleased to find one whose sentiments appeared to be so just, and yet so uncommon.

We parted, and as there were indications of a storm, I pursued my way homeward. I much wondered who the little girl could be, and where she had been with her basket. I had remarked that her complexion was more fair than that of the peasant girls, and her features were of a higher and more noble cast. She had also said that she wept when she heard of my misfortunes. This was new language to me. It was the first time that the tones of genuine sympathy had reached my ears. In my subsequent rambles, I frequently caught myself wandering toward the foot of the mountain, and coming to a stand on the spot where I had met the unknown. But several weeks elapsed before I again saw the little girl. By this time I had fairly recovered my health and strength. I was walking in a wood near the base of the mountain, when I heard cries as of some person in distress. I hastened to the spot from which the noise proceeded, and saw my little friend standing on the top of a rock, while a wolf greedily surveyed her from the ground, and appeared to be on the point of ascending to her. I caught up a large stone which I threw with all the force of which I was capable. It struck him in the side and knocked him over, but he quickly regained his feet. I then attacked him with a club and drove him off. I assisted the little girl in her descent from the rock. She appeared very grateful for this deliverance; yet her gratitude was expressed more by looks than by words. Her basket was on her arm, and I wondered to what purpose it had been applied, but I forbore to inquire. We walked along together through the wood, conversing freely on a variety of topics. She was glad to see me look so well, and seemed to sympathize with all my joys and sorrows. I was surprised at some of her observations, which evinced a degree of intelligence not generally found in one of her years. When we were about to part, I begged to know her name. She told me it was Antoinette Cimbrede. I then recollected that I had heard my aunt speak of a family by the name of Cimbrede; and she had spoken of them with disrespect. She had spoken of them as persons who neglected their religious duties, and who were seldom seen at church. But I had little respect for my aunt's opinion of character. After this second interview, I frequently fell in with Antoinette, and became so well pleased with her that I made her the confidant of all my affairs. She was also communicative, but there were some subjects on which she gave me no light. She never told me why the basket was always on her arm when I met her. I once mentioned that my aunt did not appear to be on good terms with her parents. She immediately became silent and thoughtful. I frequently waited upon her home. I did not enter the house, but parted from her at the garden gate. I judged from the appearance of their domain that her parents were in good circumstances. But she always mentioned them with evident reluctance. Occasionally she would make an observation which evinced a minute knowledge of my history. These things kept my curiosity awake, and added to the deep interest which I felt for her.

Thus passed my life until I had attained my fifteenth year. Antoinette was now a young woman of surpassing beauty, and uncommon intelligence. Our interviews had become more interesting. The childish intimacy which had subsisted between us ripened into love. She was to me like a fountain in the desert. She had been the only true friend whom I had known, and the tie of gratitude had bound me to her indissolubly; and when to this was added the most ardent admiration of her feminine graces, the result could not be anything else but love. Although I spent much of my time in the society of this interesting maiden, yet I learned but little of her parents. We met in groves; on the grassy hill-side; or on the craggy heights, where we listened to the roar of the waterfall, and romance added interest to our interviews.

On one of these occasions, I ventured to ask Antoinette if her parents would be likely to approve our intimacy, if they knew of it.

'They do know it,' was her reply.

'You surprise me, Antoinette!' I returned: 'I am a stranger to them'—

Here she suddenly looked up, and with an expression in her countenance which checked my words; for I thought she was about to say something about them. But she seemed to recollect herself. She slightly blushed, and her eyes fell beneath my own. I went on—'As I am a perfect stranger to your parents, is it not somewhat singular that they should not have prohibited these interviews. Also, you will recollect that I am an orphan—for I learn from my uncle that my parents died in Holland—and I have no expectations beyond those which my uncle's stinted generosity will allow me: and you know how much I may hope from him'.

'Well, Edouard, I shall have enough for both of us.'

'Ah! my dear girl, do your parents reason in that manner? Do they say'—

'Indeed! you must not ask me what they say'?

'Surely there is much mystery in this,' I replied.

'Can you suppose me otherwise than anxious on this particular point? I have never seen them. They have never spoken to me'—

'Is it not sufficient that they are perfectly well acquainted with all that has passed between us, and are satisfied with the part I have acted'? returned Antoinette.

'It ought to satisfy me,' I returned thoughtfully; but with a cloud of disappointment on my brow; as I had hoped to penetrate the mystery in which her parents were shrouded.

'Yes, Edouard, you must be satisfied; for I tell you that there will be no difficulty on their part'.

'But my uncle and aunt,' said I. 'They know nothing of the affair, and they cannot object to our union'.

Antoinette was silent. She cast down her eyes, and a paleness gradually stole over her features. After a few moments' silence, I added: 'There is one other subject, Antoinette, upon which I have long desired to question you. When we first met, at the foot of the mountain, I observed a well filled basket on your arm; and I saw you carrying it frequently afterward: but when our acquaintance had begun to—to—to be more peculiar—then I saw that the basket was transferred from you to an old servant'—

Antoinette fixed her large black eyes upon my countenance, as if she would read my very soul. I paused an instant, and continued: 'Yes, I have observed an old servant lingering about the foot of the mountain with that same basket; and sometimes I have thought his conduct strange, for he would walk backward and forward, and keep his eyes fixed upon me, as if he mistook me for a robber'.

'That is strange,' said Antoinette, twirling a bunch of grapes in her hand, and avoiding my eyes.

'I thought his conduct strange,' said I, 'and when I mentioned—'

Antoinette suddenly grasped my arm, and looked anxiously in my face.

'To whom?' cried she. 'To whom did you mention it?'

'Not to my uncle or my aunt,' said I with a smile, 'for they are not in my confidence. I was going to say that when I mentioned it to you, I had hoped that some explanation would be given.'

Antoinette relinquished my arm, and once more she relapsed into a musing mood. At length she said carelessly, 'Then you have not mentioned it to any person except myself.'

'I have not, Antoinette. I feel a peculiar disinclination to talking about you, or any of your family, to those bigoted creatures with whom I daily associate'.

Antoinette looked up with a lively smile—'Now tell me, dear Edouard, are they really so very bigoted?'

'Yes,' said I. 'With them bigotry is the sublimest of virtues. My parents are regarded by them, as the worst of sinners, for having belonged to that party who called themselves Huguenots: but I fancy that one might have belonged to that party without becoming guilty of the excesses of which many of them were guilty'.

'What excesses were those, my Edouard?'

'Such as fighting against the government, and endeavoring to overthrow religion,' said I.

'They never tried to overthrow what they conceived to be true religion,' replied Antoinette; 'and when they fought, it was in their own defence—in defence of the right to worship God in their own way. They believe that government has no right over their religion'.

'I shall not be angry with you for defending that people,' I answered—'since my parents were of their number: but I have heard many things against them.'

In the mean time, let me caution you about talking thus; for it is very dangerous. A poor man, living not far from us, was yesterday stretched on the rack for saying that the Church was not infallible'.

'I have only given their opinions,' returned Antoinette with a sigh—'but what an atmosphere of bigotry and intolerance have you breathed! You may yet become a bigot without knowing it—and then, alas!'—Here her utterance was choked. She hid her face with her hands, and sobbed aloud.

Grieved and surprised, I exclaimed: 'Surely, Antoinette, you are not well! To what cause must I attribute this unusual emotion? Have I said or done anything'—

'No, no, Edward,' interrupted she hastily: 'you have ever treated me tenderly; but I tremble for the future. My happiness depends upon you; and I sometimes fear that the influence of those with whom you live will blast the fair prospect that has risen up before me. Indeed! I have expected too much of you. Had you lived with your parents, how different would have been your—your—your way of thinking'!

'Antoinette!' cried I, starting up—'do you know what interpretation I must put upon your words? My parents—my way of thinking! You just now feared I should become a bigot, but are not the Huguenots the worst of bigots—bigoted in favor of heresy! I can look with a charitable eye upon the errors of such as have been led away from the true rock, by crafty heretics, and I cannot esteem those whose conduct is immoral, however zealous they may be in the performance of holy rites: but I cannot approve those errors which involved my poor parents in ruin, and which have given so much pain to the Holy Father at Rome. Do you not know that if I had been brought up by my parents, I might have been a heretic also; and then, dear Antoinette, what would your parents have said to our union? Then you would have spurned me with disdain, and would never have perilled your soul by conversing with me'!

'Oh, no, Edouard!' replied she with energy—'no difference of opinion would have alienated my heart from you. So that you possessed those high and noble feelings which first won my admiration, I should scarcely have noticed the difference in our creed'.

I looked scrutinizingly at Antoinette. She met my gaze fully, and I read nothing in her clear bright eyes, but the utmost simplicity and candor.

'Can you be in earnest?' said I. 'You do then carry love too far. I have heard of those who would risk their lives, and lose them too, for a beloved object; but the soul, Antoinette! No one should trifle with his soul's salvation; and there is but one road to Paradise'.

Antoinette burst into tears. I saw that she was very unhappy; but I thought her unreasonable to make so much ado about such a trifle; and even felt a little vexed that she should seem to insist upon my being so extremely tolerant as herself.

Soon after the foregoing conversation, we parted; but not as we had been wont to part. We separated in gloom and tears. It was the first time that anything had happened to mar the pleasure which I had experienced in the company of Antoinette: and I could not avoid regarding her as the originator of the unpleasant events which had brought up a cloud in our horizon.

Ought she to have wept, and thus given me pain, because I could not regard heretics with a favorable eye? I found no fault with her for doing so. But did she really expect to control me with her tears? Ought she to indulge in such wilfulness? I asked myself these questions, and they added to my distress. I was sad and moody when I reached my uncle's door. I perceived that visitors were in the house; and my aunt came out soon, with an unusually smiling face, to lead me into the room where they were. The company consisted of a Mr. Bloise, with his lady and daughter. I had frequently heard my aunt speak of this family; and the language which she used respecting them, intended for high praise, had prejudiced me much against them. Their personal appearance was not calculated to enhance their merit in my eyes. They all bore a near resemblance to each other. The daughter, though but nineteen years of age, looked as old as her parents. The freshness of youth appeared to have been withered up by bigotry; and if the face was an index of the mind, then indeed she must have possessed a heart devoid of every generous feeling. I turned my eyes away from a countenance so revolting, and took my seat at a distance from the group. The conversation turned upon the state of religion in France. The Huguenots were censured in unmeasured terms, and Mr. Bloise boasted that he had been instrumental in bringing more than a dozen of them to condign punishment. My aunt smiled applause, as he described the tortures to which the heretics had been subjected; and the daughter even had the assurance to look in my face with a smile of triumph, as if she expected that she should recommend herself to me, by a show of malignant joy at the bloody persecutions of her fellow-creatures.

Throughout the evening my aunt evidently desired to bring us together. She caused me to move my seat nearer to Maria, for that was the name of the daughter; and at supper her chair was placed next to mine. In spite of all this finesse and manoeuvring, but few words passed between me and Maria; and when she and her parents left the house, late in the evening, we had made but few advances toward an acquaintanceship. On the next morning, at the breakfast table, my uncle abruptly asked me how I was pleased with Miss Bloise. I replied evasively, that I had not been enough in her company to form an opinion of her character.

'That you did not need,' cried my aunt, 'you had heard her character before she came here. Your uncle would know how you are pleased with her manners and appearance.'

'Of course, she is not handsome,' replied I.

'Not handsome!' exclaimed my aunt—'What may then be your ideas of beauty? You chance to differ in opinion from not only me and your uncle, but also father Lomonde, father Costelli, and father Jaques, who have all declared that her face and form were of so etherial a mould that they—'

'Not handsome, boy!' cried my uncle, laying down his spoon, and fixing his small black eyes upon my countenance. 'Would you insult a young lady, with a fortune superior to my own, and of such exalted piety—such filial attachment to holy church as to be an example not only to you, but to those whose heads have grown gray in the service of God! Don't let father Pierre hear you speak thus, or you will have a severe penance appointed you.'

'I don't wish to insult her, or any other pious person,' said I quickly, in order to avert the rising storm, 'but the young lady is not to my taste.'

'Very well—very well—she must be to your taste if you expect any thing from me,' exclaimed my uncle furiously; 'What, boy, would you throw away a jewel that a monarch might be proud to wear—one who is the ornament of society, and the pride of all her acquaintances—while you—what are you, in short?'

'I am a friendless orphan,' returned I, 'and have ever shown a disposition to obey the commands of those who have taken care of me. I perceive, Sir, that you intend I should marry Miss Bloise; but I am still quite young, and of course, there will be sufficient time for me to get acquainted with her—'

'No, boy: no time at all. She has always been intended for you, although we have not named her to you before. I have now received such tidings from Court, as renders it necessary that the marriage should be immediately solemnized—next week at the farthest.'

I will not pretend to describe the shock which this announcement gave me. At that moment it seemed to me that if Antoinette had possessed ten thousand faults, I could have overlooked them all, and I wondered that I should, for a moment, have indulged resentment toward her. Veiling my distress as well as I could, I answered: 'But, pray sir—what can the Court of King Louis have to do with my marriage?'

'Every thing!' cried my uncle. 'He is beset by ill advisers, who have not the good of the church at heart, and they bid fair to throw impediments in the way of all good Catholics, and to render our plans for your happiness nugatory and abortive.'

I was puzzled to make out my uncle's meaning; but earnestly hoped that whatever those impediments were, they would be thrown in the way of so horrible a union as that which my uncle and aunt had projected for me. Of that, however, I had little hope. The time was so short, and my uncle and aunt were so determined, that I was rendered desperate; and I frankly told them that I had long been paying my attentions elsewhere—that I loved a being bright as the sun, and pure as ether, and could be happy with none but she.

'Indeed!' said my aunt, with a sneer; 'and who is this wonderful creature, that has the honor of your affection?'

'Antoinette Cimbrede!' cried I.

For a moment, not a word was said. My aunt fixed her eyes coldly upon me for a moment, and then turned them toward her husband. His face was fairly black with rage; his lips quivered; and his small black eyes grew red with spite and fury: 'Have you eat at my table?' cried he, at length—'have you dared to address me by the sacred name of uncle—have you dared to set foot into this house while you have been carrying on a felonious correspondence with that family?'

'Felonious! No, Sir.'

'Don't interrupt me!' exclaimed he, stamping so violently on the floor, that the breakfast dishes trembled and rang—'What else but a felonious correspondence can be carried on with—with heretics?'

'Heretics!' said I; 'certainly they cannot be—'

'Alas!' interrupted my aunt, as if my words were of not the least consequence; 'is it for this that we have trained him up in the way he should go? Is it for this that we have taught him to pray—that we have labored to make him all that we ought to be?'

By this time, my uncle's first transport of fury had, in some measure, subsided.

'The boy may be ignorant,' said he—'but now he must know the truth, and then he will see the gulf from which he has escaped. You must understand,' continued he, turning to me, 'that the Cimbrede family have long been suspected of entertaining heretical opinions. Your aunt and I have keenly watched for an opportunity to prove their guilt, in order that we might denounce them, and bring them to punishment. No such opportunity has yet offered, and we fear that certain events are now transpiring at Court, which will enable them to escape—'

'God grant they may!' interrupted I, rendered desperate at the idea of seeing Antoinette's beautiful form mangled by the inquisitors.

'God grant what!' cried my uncle in redoubled rage, while my aunt's eyes flamed with diabolical malice. 'Would you have them escape? Are you a Huguenot?'

'Merciful heaven!' I exclaimed, 'can they be Huguenots?'

'There is not a doubt of it,' replied my uncle, 'and now, boy, you see your danger! Oh! what penances you must perform—what grief you must feel, to think that you have held communication with that family.'

I covered my face with my hands and wept aloud. I now recollected the words of Antoinette, her defence of the heretics; and was at no loss to understand the meaning of her gloom and her tears. There was, indeed, an insuperable barrier between us.

'I am glad,' said my uncle in a softened tone, 'to perceive that you now appreciate our motives. You may be able, in some degree, to atone for what you have done, by delivering up this family to condign punishment. Perhaps you recollect some words—something that will fasten upon them the charge of heresy.'

'No, Sir,' said I, still weeping—'I was never in their house. I never saw her parents.'

'The girl then—this Antoinette,' said my aunt; 'I am confident that you can bring her to the rack. Oh! how I should like to see her stretched upon it, until her joints were torn from their sockets.'

'Yes, yes, that must be done,' said my uncle; 'but the first thing, now, is to have the marriage performed. It has been neglected too long already; and I fear that it is even too late to punish heretics; for the law in their favor, may be already passed.'

I went forth from the presence of my uncle in a state of mind which I cannot describe. I was shocked at the malice which my aunt had exhibited toward Antoinette, and I began to doubt whether it was ever right to persecute people on account of their religion. I recollected, however, that the Huguenots had always persecuted where and when they could; and if the Catholics persecuted to a greater extent than they, it was only because they happened to be the party in power. Also, the Catholics believed that there was no salvation out of the pale of the ancient church; while the heretics claimed the right to exercise their own free judgment on the subject of religious opinions. Therefore, when the Catholics persecuted, they merely carried out their principles; but when the Huguenots did so, they evinced the grossest inconsistency. My uncle had also intimated that a law was about to be passed which would free the heretics from farther persecution. This, I thought, did the Catholics much honor, since they would voluntarily lay aside the persecuting sword, while they had the power to wield it: whereas, I had never known any sect of Protestants to tolerate Catholics until the power to persecute had been fairly wrested from them. At this very time, Catholics were fleeing from England and Ireland, to France, to avoid the racks and gibbets of Queen Elizabeth; while hundreds of Catholic priests had been hung and embowelled according to her laws and within her jurisdiction.

These reflections tended to incense me against the Huguenots, while they confirmed my reverence for Mother Church. I felt that I could not consistently marry Antoinette, and knew that I must marry the narrow-souled and homely Maria! My reflections were torturing to my inmost soul. I loved Antoinette, and every well-remembered word, and look of hers, bespoke purity, disinterestedness, and lofty virtue. I doubted not that she had been led away from the Truth by her parents, and I inwardly abhorred them for having tainted so lovely and amiable a creature with their own heresies. But little time was left me to indulge in unavailing regrets.

On one fine morning in July, I was called upon to attend my uncle and aunt to Church. As our carriage passed along, I observed a number of people collected together in a gorge of the mountains, and very soon I heard the sound of singing. The notes of praise to God were borne on the breeze to our ears. My uncle hastily drew up the blind of the coach to shut out the sounds, while, at the same time, it deprived me of the interesting sight. I could not, however, be insensible that there were sounds of rejoicing abroad. I could hear an occasional shout which floated over the plain from a great distance, and whenever the sound met our ears, my uncle clenched his teeth, and muttered an imprecation; while my pious aunt crossed herself with great rapidity.

At length we reached the church. Maria Bloise and her parents were already there, with several other individuals, whose countenances were as sour as if they had just undergone a baptism in vinegar. The priest soon came stalking into the Church. In a moment, preparations were made for the marriage. I stood up by the side of Maria, more dead than alive. I felt that I was about to be sacrificed. Never shall I forget that awful hour. Worse than the pangs of death had taken hold of me. One of the by-standers came to my support, or I should have fallen to the ground. The ceremony commenced; when suddenly, the door flew open; a woman walked hastily up the aisle, and did not stop until she had broken through the throng, and stood confronting the priest.

'Stop!' cried she—'I forbid this marriage!'

I looked with wonder at the woman. Strange recollections—strange feelings took hold of me; for there was something in her countenance that had the same effect upon me as that music which brings up the impressions of by-gone days.

My uncle and aunt turned suddenly toward the stranger. As their eyes fell upon her, they started, and both exclaimed in a breath—'Go on with the marriage, holy father, and heed not this heretic! Will nobody seize this woman, and take her out of the Church?'

'I am the lad's mother!' exclaimed she, 'and I forbid the marriage!'

'Aha!' exclaimed the priest—'seize the heretic! She has condemned herself! Away with her to the rack!'

My uncle sprang forward to seize her. At the same moment, I recovered from the stunning effect of this disclosure. I felt that it was my own mother who stood before me. Nature cried aloud in my breast; and, breaking away from the girl to whom I was about to be united, I grasped my uncle's arm, and hurled him away from my mother. Others came suddenly up to lay hands on her, while the priest gnashed his teeth with rage.

She immediately drew a paper from her bosom, and held it up in the view of all. It was a copy of the law which had just been passed, called THE EDICT OF NANTZ, which granted to dissenters the free exercise of their religion throughout all France.

The assailants fell back. My uncle and aunt saw that they could no longer exercise control over me by force. Both approached me, and with insinuating smiles, desired me to go through with the marriage ceremony, as it was not possible that a good Catholic like me would be ruled by a heretic mother.

'She is my mother!' cried I; 'and as she is living—contrary to my former suppositions—I owe my duty to her. You know that I abhorred this marriage from the first; and now I am freed from it by the command of my long-lost mother'.

'Father,' cried my intended wife, 'cannot Edward be put on the rack for refusing to marry me, and for obeying this Huguenot woman? 'Alas! no'—replied her father. We have now no power over him, for the very Huguenots themselves are protected by this new law'. I stopped to hear no more, but followed my mother out of the church, fondly clinging to her side for fear I should lose sight of her again.

My mother went directly to the house of the Cimbredes; and there I soon became acquainted with facts that filled me with amazement.

It appeared that my father owned the house and lands now in possession of my uncle; but my parents turned Huguenots. My uncle informed against them, and they were obliged to flee to Holland to save their lives. My uncle and aunt then took possession of my father's estate. So sudden was the flight of my parents that I was left behind, and consequently came into the power of my uncle. In the course of a few years, my father died; and my mother being anxious about me, came to France and took up her residence in a cave upon the mountain which overlooked my uncle's dwelling. There she resided several years, and was furnished with food by the parents of Antoinette. That was the secret of the basket which I had observed so often on the arm of Antoinette, and which was transferred to a trusty servant after the intimacy between myself and the daughter rendered it imprudent to send her any more to the mountain.

My mother was, therefore, the 'guardian angel' who attended to my wants, when I was suffering from the ill usage of my uncle and aunt. Of course, she had had ample opportunity to become acquainted with everything which transpired at the villa.

My mother immediately took possession of our estate; and my uncle and aunt relinquished it with curses deep and loud against those who had prevailed on the King to grant toleration to heretics. They retired to a smaller estate of their own which had been rented to others.

The influence of my mother's conversation was soon apparent; and I saw the folly of clinging to a church which had become rotten with corruption, and which chained the reason and conscience of her votaries.

I had now ample opportunity to enjoy the company of Antoinette, and our attachment was smiled upon by the parents of both.

Although the Edict of Nantz had been passed, yet my mother had little faith in the constancy of Catholic toleration. She sold her estate, and removed with me into Holland, to which country she was soon followed by the Cimbredes; and there, over my father's grave, Antoinette and I again renewed our vows. Soon after our removal to Holland, our marriage took place, and I was made the happiest of men.

MAY.

[THIS article was delayed in reaching us, so that we did not receive it till after our No. for May was issued. But the real June comes the nearest to the ideal May.]

Now speed thee on thy northward way,
To cheer us with thy gladness, May;
Bring from the sunny South its bloom,
On thy warm breath its sweet perfume;
New life and stronger pulse impart
To our earth's chilled and sluggish heart,
And cause its living springs to flow
In quickened currents. Loved May, throw
Thy mantle o'er the wet, bare fields,
Their nakedness no pleasure yields.
Hold out thy sceptre, now, to these Ungarnished, gloomy forest trees,
That to assaulting winds and storms,
Have long exposed their giant forms;
Their figures look much better seen
In their becoming coat of green.
Come—thou art queen, now dispossess
The earth and air of sullenness.
Winter's dethroned—he left the land
In exile with his rustic band;
The largest and the brightest gem
Which decked his evening diadem—
The glory of his matchless crown—
In thy first twilight melted down.
His power is crushed; now, o'er its tomb
Shed sunlight to dispel its gloom.

She's with us here, already come,—
I know it by the busy hum
Of house-flies; 'gainst the window pane
They buzz and beat their heads in vain;

I know by the exploring bee
That comes to find the blossomed tree.
I know it May,—as thou dost pass,
The ground is covered up with grass;
On verdant hillocks the young lambs
Frisk heedlessly about their dams;
The waiting wood from thee receives
Its modest drapery of leaves,
And from its lofty branches gush
Responsive melodies. The rush
Is starting from its miry bed
To meet the willow's drooping head,
Which lets its yellow blossoms go
Into the brook that runs below;—
I know it by the violet flower,
And by the sudden, transient shower,
Already past. The parted cloud
Rolls back its heavy, sable shroud;
Jehovah's token re-appears,
With promise sealing future years.
A sign of blessing is his bow
To his loved children here below;
His smile expands it to renew
His covenant unchanged and true.
'Tis sure and sacred—while ye can,
Gaze on its beauty. Husbandman,
Now let a well-established trust
Appease thy animated dust;
And put thy corn into the ground,
That it may die—fruit will abound.
With patience toil and sweat endure,
For thee a harvest is secure.
If sunbeams scorch the tender blade,
Be not thy trusting soul afraid;
If rains deluge thy richest land,
On God's sure promise firmly stand;
If early frost should blight the ear,
E'en then let not thy spirit fear;—
His word eternal truth remains,
Nor will he scourge with needless pains.

List to the playful children's shout
Upon the still air ringing out.
From mamma's circumspection fled,
Bared is the little, curly head;
The shoes and stockings thrown away,
The liberated feet with play
In their unbandaged nakedness
And freedom, with the water cress,
Will wander through the dells abroad
And press in glee the green, cool sod;
Rejoicing, in the moistened clay,
Will leave their impress by the way,
Exact in placing every toe
So that the pliant clay can show
A cognizable shape and size.
Delight is sparkling in their eyes—
These thoughtless ones—behold them bound
To the exhilarating sound
Of their own merry laugh; and still
With buoyant spirits as they fill
Their hands with fragrant May-flowers give
From pure, light hearts thanks that they live.

We're happier that we have heard
The echo of your spirit stirred
To artless worship, childhood;—now,
Go, with the unmarked, sinless brow
Go, children, night is coming on,
From woods and damp meads be ye gone.

Insensibly the chilling dews
Are falling; as the housewife views
The onward march of night, she hies
With quicker footsteps, while she plies
With active hands her dusting brooms,
Restoring order to her rooms,
And giving to them all an air
Of comfort, an appearance fair.
The wheel that whirled and whizzed all day,
The thrifty maid has put away;
All things arranged about the house,
They wait the lover or the spouse;
The brother and the father dear
Are sure of ease and welcome here.

How rapidly at day's decline
The minutes fly! how faintly shine
The timid stars, just peeping through
Their soft and gauzy veil of blue.
They were, a year ago this night,
As lovely to the gazer's sight;
They change not—heavenly things ne'er do,
But to grow clearer to our view.
As darkness frowns, far brighter seems
The radiance of their dancing beams,
And still increasing is their host
While each one glitters at his post.
With bolder blaze Arcturus glows,
Across the sky his red light throws;
And Virgo, from her path on high,
Drops down her corn as she glides by.—
O I should know that love and bliss
Must dwell above a sky like this;
And know, that blessings without number
God gives us, even while we slumber.

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF WOMAN'S LIFE. NO. VIII.

BY CHARLOTTE.

MATRIMONY.

'O MATRIMONY! thou art like
To Jeremiah's figs!
The good are very good indeed,
The bad, too poor to give the pigs,'—

THUS merrily carolled the two madcaps Kate Mortimer and Ida Ross to the tune of 'Old Grimes,' as they burst into the chamber of their friend Sophy Morris, who was busily engaged with dress-makers and milliners. The bed was completely covered with all the paraphernalia of a lady's wardrobe, and the carpet was littered from one end to the other with shreds of silk, satin, and muslin. The reader will naturally suppose that all these preparations 'meant something,' and the fact is, (I will whisper it to you in confidence) the young lady was 'getting ready to be married'!

'There, isn't that a quaint old song, Sophy dear, and it's true every word of it! Now pray who would run the risk of getting the bad figs, just because there is the merest possible chance that they may get the good ones? Only think, child, what a hazardous experiment! I wouldn't venture for the world, and yet there you sit within the very shadow of this living death, with the most imperturbable composure as if nothing was going to happen. Well—there's really no accounting for some people's dispositions.'

'And bless me, what a clutter!' chimed in Ida. 'Lucky for you, Sophy, that Charles Parsons has not the entree of this sanctum sanctorum—for could he take but one peep, I fear you twain would never become one flesh. How I should like to see the consternation depicted on his prim, precise looking face, could he look in here just now. Why his organ of order would be so completely disordered, I fear he would never recover from the shock; and he would stalk with solemn dignity out of the house, wisely exclaiming, 'What an escape! I would sooner live a bachelor forever, than wed with such an untidy piece of Eve's flesh as Sophy Morris.' And so, poor girl, in spite of all the efforts you have been making ever since you were 'sweet sixteen,' up to the present time when you have reached the mature age of two-and-twenty, to get a husband, you will be doomed to remain Sophy Morris, spinster, to the end of your miserable days.'

But Sophy was one of those demure, uncomeatable sort of people, who are proof against all raillery, and take it with the utmost composure, without ever allowing you to discover their vulnerable point; and all her rattling companions could extort by their banter, was a quiet smile.

'After all,' resumed Kate, 'I don't know that you are so much to be pitied, Sophy; for you are just the sort of person to be married, and I've no doubt you'll be a perfect pattern of conjugal love and devotion. Nobody else would have answered for Charles Parsons; stern and precise and haughty as he is, I am sure he would never have the heart to frown upon or scold you, and if he did, you would have a soft smile or a gentle word to disarm his anger or peevishness. But such a humdrum existence would never do for me. I could not endure a life of quiet sunshine—give me a storm or at least an April shower now and then, just to refresh the leaves and revivify the flowers! A staid, sedate matron—that is your vocation, Sophy, but it is very evident to me, that I was never born to be married; and I have the satisfaction of thinking that no poor Adam has been obliged to walk through life minus a rib, in order to enrich the world with another Eve, in the shape of Kate Mortimer. To be sure nobody has given me a chance, as yet, to prove that all this is not 'sour grapes'—but really, though I should be highly flattered and duly grateful to any likely youth, who should be so foolish as to make me a matrimonial offer, I assure you I should be much too benevolent to accept it; for we should be sure to quarrel ere the honeymoon was over, and mutually repent our bargains.'

'Better tell that to Fred Cleveland,' said Ida, 'and perhaps it may save him from the folly of offering himself, and the mortification of a refusal; though I doubt if it would be possible to convince him that you are one iota short of perfection.'

'He must be blind then, for I have taken peculiar pains to make him acquainted with my manifold imperfections, and have given him ample tokens of my shrewishness.'

'Perhaps he has a fancy to enact Petruchio, and thinks he shall yet succeed in storming the citadel, and bringing the garrison to terms of submission.'

'And I have a fancy, that were such the case, he would find himself vastly out-generalled. I have no patience with Shakspeare's Kate, for her want of proper spirit, and her easily won submission to the tyrannical caprices of that rude, rough old fellow! But this is idle—for I assure you I have not the least intention of risking my precious self on the perilous sea of matrimony. My vocation is evident; and having laughed, danced and flirted through my spring and summer time, I shall fall into the "sere and yellow leaf," a quiet, prim old maid, occupied alternately in coaxing and scolding a score of nephews and neices, and petting dogs, cats, parrots and monkies.'

'"Angels and ministers of grace defend" me from such a lot,' cried Ida, 'I have made up my mind long ago, to get married the first opportunity; and if I am never so fortunate as to change my title, you may be sure it is no fault of mine—for whenever I think of the bare possibility of being an old maid, I am haunted by terrific visions of a lean, sallow, antiquated spinster, the dread of the young and gay—a lonely, isolated being, uncared for by the present generation, and wished out of the way by the rising one.'

'O, Ida! surely you drew no portraiture of Aunt Edith!'

'No, indeed! I did not think of her—she is an exception to the whole sisterhood; but there are tears in your eyes, dear Aunt Edith! surely my nonsensical rattle has not caused them?'

'No, my dear; I know your kind heart too well, to believe you capable of wounding the feelings of any person; and I am not so weak as to be offended by any remark, however rude, bearing upon the class to which I belong. But your merry conversation recalled to my mind a similar scene, in which I was myself an actor years ago. Many recollections has it conjured up, some pleasant and others deeply sad and mournful. And of all the gay group that were gathered around me in those days, no face rises before me so vivid and life-like as that of mine ancient friend, Emily St. John.'

'O, Aunt Edith!' exclaimed Kate, 'do tell us something about her; you know how you have often promised to do so, and this is a fitting opportunity; for perhaps it will be long ere Sophy is with us again, and it is so rainy there is little fear of any body else being so hardy as ourselves in venturing out to pay a visit: so pray lay down your knitting-work, and amuse us with a story while we ply our needles to finish this wedding dress.'

The request was seconded by Ida, and even the staid, quiet Sophy lifted her mild eyes earnestly to the face of her aunt, and repeated it. 'Tis but a sorry tale, Sophy, to pour into the ear of a bride elect—a recital of matrimonial disasters, and I do not like to dishearten you by presenting the dark side of the picture'—

'O never fear,' cried Kate, 'I'll warrant Sophy will find ten bright sunbeams for every shadow you may fling; she is so fully determined to be happy, I doubt if the testimony of all the miserable devotees of matrimony would be able to render her otherwise.'

Thus urged and assured, Aunt Edith took off her glasses, wiped them, and laying them on the little table at her side, settled herself more cozily in her great arm-chair, and the girls having drawn their seats nearer to her, she laid down her knitting, and commenced the story of—

THE MIDNIGHT MARRIAGE.

In a remote part of Connecticut, almost unknown to the busy people of the world, is the snug little village of Glenlyn, where my childhood, youth, and many of my maturer years were spent. Near the old parsonage in which I was born, is a large, stately mansion embosomed in trees and shrubbery, with a fine avenue of ancient Elms, from which it has derived its name.

It was built many years ago by a gentleman connected with the high English aristocracy, who becoming dissatisfied with the movements of 'Church and State,' emigrated to America with his wife, their only child, an almost infant daughter, and one or two old and favorite servants. Struck with the quiet beauty of Glenlyn, which was then only a wooded valley, he cleared several acres of land, built that stately, English looking house, planted a garden, and they were soon settled as delightfully as outward beauty and inner comfort could make them.

They lived very quietly and happily some three or four years, until the Colonies declared war against the mother country, and then Mr. St. John's latent prejudices in favor of his native land, forbidding him to join in the strife against her, he suddenly made preparations, shut up his house, and re-embarked with his household for England,

The long protracted war was over, peace spread her banner over the land, the vale of Glenlyn was dotted all over with snow-white cottages, and echoed the sounds of the varied implements of artistical industry: the neat church shot up its slender spire through the waving foliage of ancient trees—the voices of merry children were heard in the lanes and meadow-paths, and the Elms, alone, wore a look of solitude and desertion. The long grass and the rank weeds had overgrown the walks and choked the flowers—no smoke ascended from the tall chimneys—the shutters were closely barred, and the villagers hastened past with that half-defined fear which is apt to haunt one in passing a lonesome spot.

After this long lapse of time, news came that the 'lord of the manor' was dead, and that his property which was entailed, had fallen to his nephew, who was also to marry his daughter. There was a rumor too, that the estate in Glenlyn was to be sold, and we were beginning to wonder who the new people would be, when lo, the heir arrived.

He was a fine, dignified-looking man, something more than thirty, with a serious and almost sad expression of countenance, which seemed somewhat at variance with his ruddy complexion, bright blue eyes, and open brow, and led people to suspect that some recent affliction or disappointment, greater than the loss of his uncle, had occasioned it. Mr. St. John, for so was the new proprietor named, seemed disposed to keep aloof from his neighbors, and there was a touch of stateliness about him which forbade intrusion; but his English housekeeper was a chatty, good natured sort of woman, and some of the village gossips having made her acquaintance, soon managed to possess themselves of her master's history.

Walter and Charles St. John were the children of the younger son of an ancient family, who had mortally offended his proud relations by marrying the lovely and portionless daughter of a country curate, rather than the wealthy heiress whom they had chosen for him. The young couple were content to live humbly, however, on the small income which usually falls to the younger sons of noble houses, and the love which had prompted this, in the eyes of the world, imprudent match, failed them not amid the privations they were called to endure.

Mrs. St. John died in the eighteenth year of their marriage, and was soon after followed by her husband, leaving the two sons we have mentioned, the elder seventeen and the younger ten years of age.

The elder brother of their father, who was in possession of the family estates, had but just returned from America at the time these events took place, and he wrote immediately, offering a home in his own family to Walter, and promising to aid him in his future pursuits, while Charles was consigned to his maternal grandfather's care, to be bred up for the church with the promise of a small curacy in his uncle's gift at some distant period,

The boys suffered themselves to be separated with great reluctance, and with many caresses and charges of remembrance, Walter saw his brother depart on the top of a country coach, and was then rolled away in his uncle's splendid carriage to his future home, where every kindness and attention was lavished upon him.

It may, perhaps, seem strange that he who for eighteen years had treated with neglect and contempt his brother's family, should now so suddenly, befriend that brother's son. But Mr. St. John was an excellent diplomatist: he knew very well that his estates were entailed on the male heir, and as his only child was a girl, Walter was of course heir-apparent; the plan which he had fully matured in his own mind was, to marry his nephew to his daughter and thus keep the property in his own immediate family.

With this object in view, he received Walter into his house, and sought by every possible means to attach him to his interest. Emily was twelve years his junior, and consequently was little more than a plaything for several years to the Eton boy and the college youth; and when after his studies were completed, his uncle, wisely supposing that two or three years' absence would be beneficial to his purpose, proposed that he should make the tour of Europe, he parted from Emily as from a playful child who had endeared herself by the little simple, loving ways of childhood.

In his letters, she was mentioned in the same strain; he seemed to forget that she was growing older with himself, and it was with delighted surprise and some little embarrassment, that he greeted a tall and beautiful girl in the petite cox, whom he had thought of so fondly in his absence. Ere Emily had completed her nineteenth year, she was Walter's betrothed bride.

All this time little had been said of Charles St. John, the intended curate. He had grown up quietly under the care of his grandfather, a well-educated youth, and during that parent's life had expressed no objection to the lot assigned him; but when the death of his friend threw him upon the tender mercies of the world, he at once avowed his dislike to the profession chosen for him, and his desire to enter the army. At Walter's urgent solicitations, a commission was procured for him in a regiment about leaving England for Gibraltar, and the brothers had only met once, during Walter's continental tour.

Soon after the betrothal of Walter and Emily, it was announced that Capt. St. John's regiment was ordered to return to England. Walter looked forward with delightful anticipation to his brother's return, and often pictured to his cousin, Charles' manly graces and accomplishments, till she longed almost as much as himself to behold this paragon.

He came at length and was cordially received by Walter and his Emily, and civilly, for their sakes by his uncle. Walter had not exaggerated his many agreeable qualities, and the young officer was soon the favorite of every body in the house, and not the least ardent in her admiration was his beautiful cousin.

She soon discovered that their voices harmonized admirably and their tastes were very similar; so they read, sang, walked, rode and chatted together, till Walter ere long began to wonder that he was so often left entirely alone. But he had a noble mind, little prone to suspicion, and not till unequivocal proofs forced the conviction upon him, would he allow himself to harbor the thought that though Emily's hand was pledged to him, her heart was given to his gallant young brother.

Many were the struggles he endured ere he came to this conclusion, and then he was sorely puzzled how to act. He had not been blind to his uncle's views and projects, and well knew it was the heir rather than the nephew he desired as the husband of his daughter, and he felt sure that were Charles to propose for Emily he would be rejected.

To give her up, to release her from a tie which he felt must now be anything but pleasant to her, he was resolved, but how to effect his purpose he knew not, and his noble heart was torn with conflicting emotions, when the sudden death of his uncle left him free to act.

No sooner were the last duties paid to his relative, and the mind of Emily restored to some measure of tranquility, than he made known to the lovers his purpose. At first, they were exceedingly shocked, for neither had as yet, dared to own even to themselves, that they were acting a treacherous part towards that noble soul. But when he had laid open to them his generous plans, with tears and grateful thanks they confessed that he had read aright their feelings, and all was soon happily settled.

Even Walter, despite the sacrifice he had made, had not felt so peaceful and happy for a long time. He had made the felicity of a young and loving pair, and in his own heart lay his reward.

In three months from the time of her father's death, Walter's own hand bestowed upon his brother the idol of his own best affections, and then prepared to leave them, and his native land perhaps, forever! 'Do not fear for me' he said, as he bade them farewell. 'I shall need but little for my own wants in America, whither I am going; I shall never marry, and the estates will, at my death, of course be yours—let me know that you are enjoying them during my life, and I shall be happy and content. And so, with barely sufficient for the support of his small household, he left the home of his youth, and sought in what he supposed to be almost a wilderness, a new abode.

On his arrival at Glenlyn, he was charmed with the beauty of the scenery, and being an ardent lover of flowers, he devoted the principal portion of his time to his garden, which amply rewarded him for the pains he took. This, and his library offered him ample stock of amusement and occupation, and his days seemed to glide on, smoothly and happily.

He had been a resident at the Elms, a considerable length of time ere we became acquainted with him, and then it was brought about by one of those little coincidences which serve to draw together people of similar tastes. My mother had been interested in him by the narrative of his housekeeper, my father admired his dignity, gentlemanly deportment, and I loved him because he loved the flowers. So towards the close of a midsummer day, as we were taking our accustomed walk, we came round by the low fence which enclosed his garden, and stood leaning over it, and admiring the beauty and variety of his plants, when Mr. St. John having overheard some remarks, came forward and invited us to enter, and thus and then was formed a delightful acquaintance, which soon ripened into a warm and lasting friendship between the elders of the group.

One morning, some six or seven years after he came to Glenlyn, Mr. St. John entered the parlor where we were at breakfast with an open letter in his hand, and with a sad face and sorrowful voice announced that he had received painful news from England. His sister Emily was dead! and as he pronounced her name, the tears gushed forth, spite of himself, and my mother who knew his story, felt and sympathized with the depth of sorrow that oppressed him.

When he regained his composure, he went on to say, that she had left a little girl five or six years old, that his brother who was almost distracted with the loss of his wife, had entered the East India Company's service, and was going out to Madras; thither he could not think of taking his child, and he earnestly inquired if his brother had no female friend who would look after the welfare of the child, if she should be consigned to his care.

'This child is very dear to me,' said Mr. St. John, 'for many reasons, and I am exceedingly anxious that she should come; but my housekeeper is incompetent to take charge of her, and I know not what to do. I wish'—

But what he wished did not transpire, for my mother whose interest was warmly excited, instantly offered if my father had no objection, to exercise a maternal watchfulness and care over the motherless child, a cheerful assent was given, and Mr. St. John looked his heart-felt thanks, for, for a few moments, the power of utterance seemed denied him.

In due time the little Emily arrived with her nurse, and when the first gush of sorrow, caused by the memories which her appearance recalled, had past, Mr. St. John seemed to live over again his youthful days, and see her mother's childhood renewed in her. People said she would be spoiled, but she bade fair to falsify all their predictions, for such a disposition as hers would bear a deal of petting.

O how we all loved her! rich and poor, old and young. Who could help it, when she twined herself so closely around the very fibres of our hearts! Emily St. John grew to blooming and beautiful womanhood, the idol of her uncle's soul, and the sunlight of his existence; they were all the world to each other, for of her father nothing had been heard for many years, and it was supposed that he must have fallen in some skirmish, or by the epidemic disease so prevalent in the East.

It might have been her peculiar situation as an orphan with but one relative that gave to her beautiful face such a sad, moonlight expression, for her eyes were far oftener swimming in tears, than sparkling with youthful gaiety. Some people hinted that she was in love—a very natural inference, but then they were sorely puzzled to discover the favored swain.

Unluckily, there were but few marriageable youths in Glenlyn—there was the tall, scraggy, sharp-faced, keen-eyed Lawyer Green, of whom poor Emily had a peculiar horror; my father's colleague, who besides being too young and too poor to marry, had no decided predilection for those lights of the world, less poetically termed ladies—and the village merchant par excellence, a strapping youth, from Vermont, who bore the singular cognomen, John Smith. He was quite a lady's man, and in his own estimation was excessively fascinating; but as this idea was confined wholly to himself, he found little opportunity for the exercise of his agreeable qualities.

There was one bachelor in the village whom I have omitted to mention, and who was generally overlooked by the people in their zeal to find a husband for Miss Emily. This was Dr. Talbot, a physician of some note, who had resided in Glenlyn for many years. He was a distinguished-looking man, between thirty-six and forty, every way accomplished and talented, and had long possessed the confidence and friendship of Mr. St. John.

He was Emily's senior by some twenty years, he had petted and fondled her when a child, and assisted in the cultivation of her mind as she grew older, and now that she had become a lovely and accomplished woman, he found himself deeply and devotedly in love, for the first time in his life. In proportion as his attachment increased, did his hopes decline; he thought of the vast disparity in their ages, of the familiar intercourse in which they had lived—of the prejudices which are so apt to cling to the higher ranks of the English gentry, and his heart sunk, but to give her up was impossible, and at length he determined to make known the state of his feelings to his friend, and abide by his decision.

Mr. St. John heard his confession with mingled surprise and pleasure, he assured him of his ready assent, declaring that of all the men he had ever known, there was no one to whom he would so readily entrust the happiness of his niece. Of the farther progress of the affair little was known. The Doctor had always been a frequent visitor at the Elms, and if he tarried a little longer now than formerly, no comments were made.

'Have you heard of Caroline Wyman's marriage?' said one of a party of four or five girls, who were chatting beneath the shade of one of the wide-spreading old trees in the park at the Elms—'she made a fine display I am told; the wedding took place in the church, and there was a throng of bridesmaids, splendidly attired, and the bride looked like an angel.'

'For my part,' said another of the group, 'I do not like this fashion of having the ceremony performed in church; I like the old-fashioned weddings at home, with a lively company, who will laugh, sing and dance and make one feel cheerful, after the minister has depressed one's spirits by his long face and prosy dissertations upon the important duties and solemnities of matrimony. What do you think Emily? though I dare say, you would choose a different mode from any body else.'

There was a half-smile on Emily's lip for an instant, but it faded, and there was a gentle seriousness in her words and manner as she replied—'all this mirth and splendor, and eclat may do very well for those who look upon marriage as a light thing; but to me, the hour that made me a bride, would, I think, be the most solemn and impressive of my life; and whenever I am married, the service shall be performed in our village church at midnight, with only my uncle, your parents and yourself, dear Edith, to witness it.'

'What a strange girl you are, Emily,' said the first speaker; 'though I do not believe when the trial comes, that you will adhere to this resolution—but we shall see!'

Some six or eight months after that conversation, I was somewhat startled at receiving from Emily St. John, the information that she was to be married immediately to Dr. Talbot, and that the service was to be performed according to the original resolve. She wished it to be kept perfectly private, and save those who were to be present at the ceremony, no one, not even the old servants had the least suspicion.

The wedding night came—and when the village was silent as the grave, and the servants at the Elms buried in slumber, our little group stole noiselessly forth at the solemn hour of midnight, and took our way through the park and across the meadow to the village church. My father had procured the keys of the sexton; the church door was unlocked, and we soon stood before the altar.

It was a cloudless night in May, and the moon, our only lamp, shone brightly into the long windows, and threw a silvery halo around the form of the bride. Never had Emily looked so beautiful, and Mr. St. John could hardly restrain his emotions as he whispered to my mother—'So looked my Emily when she became the wife of my brother.' Her white satin robe fell in rich folds about her gracefully bending figure, her abundant raven tresses were braided with costly pearls, the gift of her munificent uncle, and the same beautiful gems encircled her neck and arms; her large, hazel eyes were full of solemn yet tender earnestness, and her low, sweet voice faltered not as she pronounced calmly and clearly, the vows which bound her in the holiest tie to the man who knelt at her side.

The holy ceremony was soon over—silently as we had come, we departed, and with many low breathed prayers for their happiness, we left the wedded lovers at the gate of the Elms, and returned to the parsonage.

Before noon the next day, it was known that the midnight marriage had taken place, and various were the comments passed upon it. Some blamed Emily's eccentricity, others laughed at her romance, and the old gossips said, 'No good would come of a marriage thus solemnized—darkness, like the hour of her bridal, would rest upon her pathway.'

But if the wedding had been private and solemn, there was no lack of festivity at the Elms during the succeeding month, in which, if not quite congenial to Emily's taste, she took part with at least an appearance of interest.

Several years passed away, and happiness seemed to have spread her broad wing over that dwelling. Dr. Talbot and Emily were still resident at the Elms, for Mr. St. John could not part with his niece and his pets, her three beautiful children. But in due time the old man was gathered to the tomb, and then change came over that happy household. Dr. Talbot, tired of the sameness of his country life, and though now past his meridian, was anxious to remove to Boston; Emily would far rather have remained where she was, but she offered no obstacle to her husband's wishes, and in less than a year from Mr. St. John's death, the Elms was left to the care of the servants, and the family were settled in their eastern home.

We heard from them two or three times after their arrival in B—; they were pleasantly situated, so Emily wrote, but then there was a tone of sadness pervading the letters, which told that there was some secret sorrow or disappointment. They soon grew less frequent, and then ceased altogether, and we heard nothing more till orders came to discharge the servants for whom Mr. St. John had made a liberal provision, and make some disposition of the furniture, as the house was to be let for an Academy.

The Talbots were going down-hill—that was evident, and needed not the confirmation which was brought by a person from B,—who said that the Dr. had little or no practice, and had lost the greater part of his wife's property, in ruinous speculations. We were deeply grieved for poor Emily, and how much more so, when we heard that her gifted and intellectual husband, discouraged by his various losses, ill-success, and the death of his eldest boy whom he had idolized, was fast becoming a curse to himself and a disgrace to his friends. Poor Emily! the midnight marriage was now looked upon as an omen indeed.

We received no other direct information, but from time to time, mortgages were given upon the Elms, which threatened soon to swallow up the whole estate; every thing else had long since become the prey of the speculating mania which had possessed the unfortunate man; and when seven years after they left Glenlyn, we heard that Dr. Talbot was dead, his wife was left almost penniless with two children.

We sent her a consolatory and affectionate epistle, urging her to come and live with us; and while we were waiting her answer, we learnt that the Elms was sold to an English officer; he was coming to reside there, and wished all the furniture to be replaced as in the days of Mr. St. John, who had been an old friend. It was accordingly drawn forth from the garrets, and the old house soon looked like a familiar friend.

We dreaded the effect which would be produced on Mrs. Talbot by the sight of a strange family in the mansion where her happy years had been spent; but in the midst of our trouble, came a letter from her, written in a more cheerful tone than she had used for years; she said that in the midst of the darkness which encompassed her, a sunbeam had shone, and she confidently trusted her tribulation was at an end. We rejoiced in her raised spirits, and with her, hoped the night was indeed past and the sun risen.

The day came when the new family were expected to arrive at the Elms, and those who had known and loved the former occupants, watched with sorrowful curiosity to see their successors.

Early in the afternoon a carriage was said to be approaching the village; and soon after it was seen driving at a rapid rate along the road. As it wound along the avenue leading to the Elms, the heads of children were seen leaning from the window, and then the sallow, wrinkled face of an elderly man presented itself—he was talking earnestly to a lady at his side, and appeared to be urging her to look out; she was clad in deep mourning, and as she turned her face towards the old house, pale, wan, and weeping as she was, we recognized the once beautiful and idolized Emily St. John.

The gentleman was her father, who had returned from India with a broken constitution and vast wealth, to discover the brother and daughter from whom he had been so long separated. Almost immediately after his arrival, he learnt his brother's death, and the probable residence of his daughter. He had sought her diligently, and found her, widowed, poor, and lonely, struggling with want and toiling with unremitting industry and energy to maintain her orphan children; showing herself in all things, a true woman unromantic, hopeful and trustful to the last.

Gently and tenderly, he made himself known to her, and joyful was the recognition. Her dearest wish was to return to Glenlyn, and her father, having bought up the mortgages and restored the place to its original beauty, invited her to return thither to her early home. It was a season of heartfelt happiness in the whole village, for every body had loved Emily and her children, and among them all, you may be sure none more cordially rejoiced in their restored prosperity, than did the inmates of Glenlyn parsonage.

That was many years ago, and changes have come to our quiet circle. My parents have long since gone to rest, and when my brother married and offered his old maid sister a home with him in this distant city, I gladly accepted the offer.

I have never visited Glenlyn since, though both Emily and the Colonel have often urged me to do so—but I sometimes hear from my old friend, and not long ago, she wrote me word that her daughter Florence was about to be married. 'Her prospects are fair,' she said, 'and I pray she may be exempt from the sorrows that fell to my lot. I write in the room where she is busy in preparing her wedding dress—the pearls which were my bridal ornaments, and which in my extremest poverty I was forced to sell, have been re-purchased by my kind father, and are to deck my child. From this very room, dear Edith, I went forth twenty years ago, a bride, and could you see my Florence, now, as she stands before me in the bridal dress, which her gay companions have teased her to put on, you would be startled by her wondrous resemblance to what I was then. The wedding is to be small and rather private, but, please God, the sunshine shall fall upon my daughter's bridal! I have outlived my days of romance, and I have lost my predilection for a MIDNIGHT MARRIAGE.'

'Is that all, aunt Edith?' exclaimed the three girls in a breath, as the old lady put on her glasses, and quietly resumed her knitting work.

'Yes, and you have listened very patiently to my long yarn—and now, Sophy, have I disheartened you?'

'Not in the least, dear aunt—to be sure your friend had a good deal of trouble, but then she had a very large share of happiness; and she was blest, moreover, in possessing a trustful spirit.'

'Just as I told you,' cried Kate, 'she is wilfully bent on matrimony, and there is no dark spot on her vision. But I am very glad, aunt Edith, that your story ended well; I always like to have every thing come out bright. It is so provoking to get interested in story characters, and after following them through seas of tribulation, to have them inhumanly murdered at last, just as one begins to hope they are comfortably settled and about to enjoy themselves. In real life, one can't help such results, but in fiction it is really too bad.'

'But pray remember, dear Kate, that nearly all stories are founded upon some little incident in real life, else they would fail to interest us deeply; for in order to do so, they must speak to the heart, whose chords respond only to that which is true to our common nature! A light, imaginary story may please the fancy, but it is the simple records of real life, which touch and purify, even while they sadden the heart.

IMPROMPTU REPLY.

To Charlotte. Intended only for HER eye.

WHAT! 'getting old,' dear Charlotte,
You don't mean, bowed and thin,
With crow-tracks round your mild blue eyes,
And a sharp projecting chin?
You don't mean that you wear mob caps,
Each plait in prim array,
And nurse young plants, and feed pet birds,
And keep a Tabby-Gray?

I must not tell how old you are—

Nay—that I will engage—
But answer all inquiries thus—
'She's of a certain age.'

And then—ah, how the poetry
Will vanish from your name!
For who will add a single breath
To waft your rising fame?

'Tis true, your heart may not be old—
But then—a wrinkled face!

Why Lottie, for a poetess,
Imagine the disgrace!
The child of song should be exempt
From such a common doom,
And flourish, like French bonnet-wreaths,
In full, eternal bloom!

Yes, I will write the 'elegy,'
According to request;
And though the task is new to me,
Will do my very best.
Let's think—what shall the measure be
Of this most doleful song?

No matter—let the words come forth,
And march themselves along.

ELEGY.

The spring-time of thy life is gone—
At twenty-three departed;
The shades of age are creeping on—
Well mayst thou be down-hearted.

Sweet twenty-two with all its pranks
And merry, sly coquettings,
Has left thee sliding down Time's banks,
Hard pressed by fond regrettings.

Alas, poor friend! thou must, henceforth,
Wear close, 'snuff-colored' bonnets,
And sit demurely by the hearth,
Knitting, and writing 'sonnets.'

'Tis well thou art a little blue;
'T will solve the question knotty,
Why one, outliving twenty-two,
Still writes herself Miss Lottie.

Nay, nay! forbear! At my poor rhymes
You will be rude to laugh;
They are the first I ever wrote
Of dirge or epitaph.

And I am sad, for you are old;
Cause, cause enough to weep—
For I, alas, ere you were born,
Was old enough to creep!

SARAH.

GOSSIPINGS OF IDLE HOURS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

HOOR TWELFTH.

It is the first of May—a day memorable in old England for its ancient sports around the flower-wreathed pole; for its dances and shoutings upon the village-green; and for a multitude of little village romances never re-enacted in these days of formal and artificial life, but which will live in the memories of ballad readers as one of the very loveliest features in the 'Acted Poetry' of by-gone days.

It is the first of May—and a furious eastern storm which has poured down its drenching floods through the whole past night, still roars and sweeps through the upper air, like an angry god come forth to battle. No sweet May sports to day—no, not even the gathering of a green stick to deposit in prophetic attitude over the door—an interpreter of that great mystery in a young maiden's future destiny,—viz. 'Who will my husband be?'

Yet I do not regret it. I love a rainy day—occasionally. It throws one so much inward for sources of mental happiness, and seems in a great measure to shut out the gairishness and strife of the big world. Yes, even this first day of May, it is pleasant to sit at the chimney-corner with a blazing fire at one's feet, and ply the busy needle, or delve deep into the rich ore of a new and thought suggestive book.

This plying the needle—there is real enthusiasm and pleasure in it when one is in the mood. To see the shapeless fabric gradually assuming form and character beneath the operations of the fingers; to call into requisition one's taste and skill, to fashion a garb of comfort and beauty, for ourselves or some one dear to us; yea, even the very exercise of sewing is exhilarating, when the heart is in the work.

And reading, too. No time like a rainy day for close meditative reading. The birds are not forever twittering in your ears on such a day, charming you away from all the music of written thought: neither are the sunbeams stealing through your lattice, tempting you to an idle saunter in the woods; but the rain dashing in torrents upon the window pane, serves as a lively 'dancing tune,' to set one's ideas in rapid motion.

HOOR THIRTEENTH.

My gossiping soliloquy was disturbed by a sudden gleam of sunshine, darting through the dense clouds that a westerly breeze sent lumbering off over the horizon, and falling upon a red stripe in the carpet at my feet. An hour or two later and all above was blue sky, with now and then a soft fleecy cloud resting over the tops of the woodlands.

Some friends called—a walk was proposed—so adieu to books and needlework, till another rainy-day said we, leaving them scattered upon the sofa in that elegant disarray common to those whose impatient impulses are forever deaf to the cries of 'Order! order!' from the phrenological monitor in the temple.

The wood-path through which we traced our way had lost none of its olden fascinations, save that it now wanted a portion of its midsummer foliage, and bright, fragrant flowers. But there were rich beautiful mosses, soft as velvet, and green as—what? Indeed, there is nothing on earth so green! And a few very few, flowers were found, hidden beneath the last year's leaves—and the May-sticks were gathered, just budding like Aaron's rod,—and they might also perhaps, be likened to the diviner's rod, since they were about to reveal to us the buried riches of our future days. (And yet, it must be confessed, husbands and wives are not always treasures.)

Our party consisted of eight ladies, and one beau, who had arrived at the great antiquity of three years. May day! alas, is no longer a general holiday; and our village-swains remarkable rather for their industry than their gallantry, perhaps found more important occupations to claim their time than gadding in the woods for flowers. Yet it was a pleasant walk, nevertheless; we all said it was a pleasant walk—and so, dear friends, believe me, notwithstanding a rainy forenoon, and a beauless party in the afternoon, May-day was passed as happily in our quiet village as perhaps in any other spot on our globe.

Good bye!

OBITUARIES.

DIED in Providence, May 6th, Mrs. MARY, wife of Maj. RUFUS SMITH, aged 64. The record of this death has already appeared in the Journal, but without that tribute to the peculiar virtues of the departed which was expected by the writer of this humble notice. It is, perhaps, better to pause till the effect of the sudden shock, which comes at the death of a friend, is in some degree passed before we give expression to our respect for the character of the dead. And now that the wife and mother is gone—now when the heart feels how large was the place she filled in the home, and now, when her affectionate history is conned over with that concentration of thought by which her excellences are more justly appreciated than ever,—we may speak without subjecting ourselves to the charge of exaggeration. In sober truth it may be written, that Mrs. Smith was a pattern wife and mother. Home was earth's chief place to her, and in her care of her large family she seemed to ever have before her mind the Apostolic admonition—'Let them learn first to show piety at home.' Therefore, every thought of the mother in the minds of her children, is a thought which pays homage to unfaltering fidelity and most devoted self-sacrificing love. Many years she was called to suffer seriously, but she lifted not herself against God. Her trials, her weaknesses, her sufferings, were to her the chastenings of a merciful Being, who by the shades as by the lights of existence, would train his children for the enjoyment of the better part of life. She humbly submitted to whatever deprivation she was called to bear, and was grateful for that Divine Goodness which had continued to her those who could minister to her necessities more tenderly than others.

And to the last, her prayer was for patience and meek resignation; and when the tongue had refused its office and the eye only could speak, its holy and beautiful light was the reflection of christian thought in her soul.

Thus she passed away—as meek a sufferer as ever left a testimony in behalf of the blessedness of the faith and hope of the Gospel. Her beatified spirit needs not our prayers to raise her higher in the realms of bliss, but we need to pray that the sanctity of her life may exert that redeeming power in our own being, which will verify unto us the ancient truth, that 'the memory of the just is blessed.' May he who hath said, 'As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you,' manifest himself to the large circle of relatives and friends, and grant them the consolations which are in Christ.

B.

DIED in Perrysburg, Ohio, on the 2nd day of April, Mrs. ABIGAIL K. SPAFFORD, consort of JARVIS SPAFFORD, aged 33 years.

What is more instructive and profitable to the living than the life and death of a christian? When they are with us, few appreciate their worth, or follow their example, and it is not until the grave receives them, that we become fully sensible of our loss. We are told that death is the grim tyrant, and he is painted as being full of horror, but it is nothing for the christian to die, for one whose faith is fixed, not on the passing fleeting pageants of earth, but on that pure inheritance reserved in God's kingdom, 'where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest.'

Such was the death of her who has left us. Her faith remained 'like an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast' until her spirit returned to the God who gave it, and on her dying bed her request was that her funeral sermon be preached from the words of the Apostle, 'for as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.' This was the corner stone of her belief, and it was a glorious consolation to her throughout her long and painful sickness that the promises of God embraced the whole human family, and 'that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.'

She was universally respected and beloved, and although a firm and unwavering believer, that the Apostle Paul spoke the truth when he said that 'God our Savior will have all men to be saved,' yet none could help acknowledging however circumscribed and partial their views but that she was a sincere and devoted follower of the precepts of Jesus. ## EDITOR'S BOOK TABLE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., JUNE, 1843.

Ladies' Repository. Last No. of Volume Eleven.

With the present issue ends our eleventh Volume, and we trust our readers will acknowledge that we have fulfilled the promises made at the beginning. The bound volume will be regarded as a valuable book. Its variety will please, while its wisdom will instruct; and we hesitate not to say that it will be found to equal in all the essentials of a good book, any religious magazine of any denomination of christians. Knowing the good work which is being wrought by this magazine, we are grateful for the measure of patronage which ensures its continuance, and for the talent enlisted in its behalf from our correspondents. While we are thus grateful, we wish the fact to be distinctly understood, that the patronage of the Repository is not what it should be. Its chief circulation is in small towns, in Western New York; and in the far West. Cities yield it but little favor. In some cities where our largest congregations are, we have but very few subscribers—in some cases not a half dozen. This we presume has been, in a good degree, in consequence of our having had no travelling agent, and we trust that an enlargement of our list by the efforts of such an agent will witness to the justness of this opinion. A travelling agent will be employed this Spring and Summer, and we trust that our friends will give him the assistance he may need to become acquainted with the Universalists of their respective towns and cities. We shall continue those labors which have gained from the general press the high encomiums which laud the tone, and style, and moral and literary character of the Repository; and we earnestly hope that none of our present subscribers will cease to give us their encouragement.

To our correspondents, we render our grateful acknowledgments, and assure them that it gives us real pleasure to receive their promises of future aid. We esteem our list of contributors very highly, and cannot but be proud of them knowing how well their articles compare with the best contributions of the popular periodicals of the day.

We acknowledge with gratitude the late appeal made by Br. T. J. Greenwood, through the columns of the 'Christian Freeman,' in behalf of the Repository, and trust that this work will never cease to merit such approbation for its readers, and such recommendations to others, as the writer in that article was pleased to offer. His call is to the females of our denomination, and will it not be answered? We wait in hope.

The Women, the Wives, and the Daughters of England. By Mrs. Ellis, 3 Vols.

Mrs. Ellis is known in this country by her 'Poetry of Life,' issued before her marriage, when she was plain Sarah Stickney. In the three works above named, she does not deal in poetry, but in simple matters of fact, and presents the reader with a good deal of rare 'common sense.' The plan of these works would hardly be suggested to any one by the titles, for they are not biographies or sketches of character, but essays on duties, customs, and all the minutia of domestic and social intercourse. In the first she treats of the social duties and domestic habits of women; in the second, on the relative duties, domestic influences, and social obligations of wives; and in the third, on the position in society, character, and responsibilities of daughters. These volumes have been issued in a neat book form, thin covers, on good paper and with good clear type, and though covering 116 pages each, yet the price is but 25 cts.—and indeed we see them advertised for 12 1-2. There are some very fine passages in these works, for indeed Mrs. Ellis is at times a very elegant and eloquent writer, and many of her suggestions are evidently the result of a mind that sympathizes deeply with those who have made but little preparation to live, and to whom she would offer friendly advice. No one will fault her works by the charge that they are not particular enough, for she canvasses the whole matter with Quaker plainness; and no doubt she has written indirectly to the men, husbands, and sons of England, expecting that as the Queen read she would hand the book to Prince Albert. We do not believe much of her philosophy as she treats of the 'Characteristics of Men,' for—very politely of course—we must reject as we abominate such sentiments as the following:—'The love of woman appears to have been created solely to minister; that of man, to be ministered unto.' And this is thrown in to illustrate the proposition, that 'if a woman should venture to judge of man's love by her own, she would probably commit one of the most fatal mistakes by which human happiness was ever wrecked.' 'Ma conscience! We thought there was a Unity in Love, but we are thrown into the mystics—not hysterics—by being told that 'Man's love was created to be ministered unto!' What kind of love must that be? Woman, of course, is man's loving slave, if this be correct; he is selfish, she all self-denial. We have too high an opinion of woman to receive this idea, inasmuch as when woman can be won by a love that is to be ministered unto, but which ministers not, we shall have to conclude that a strange transformation has taken place in her character, whereby selfishness is made very loveable! We hope all Victorias will read and reflect upon these essays, before they hand them to the Prince Alberts of the kingdom, as the author asserts that 'it is unquestionably the inalienable right of all men to be treated with deference, and made much of in their own houses.' But yet women cannot expect to do much good by handing the book on the Wives to the Husband, because Mrs. E. assures us that 'man's love never increases after marriage.' We pity the wife that receives that sentiment, and regret that such a sentiment should be written of the marriage institution.

Pleasant Memories of Pleasant Lands. By Mrs. Sigourney. Pp. 368.

The plan of this neat work is somewhat novel. Mrs. S. does up in verse her descriptions of the places she visits, and the wonders she meets with, and the historical associations and moral reflections suggested by the 'sights' in her journeyings. To her poems she attaches notes and observations, as addenda and explanations. Some of Mrs. S.'s very best poems are in this volume, and we have read several with a degree of pleasure which we never expected to receive from any poetry of hers. But still our opinion of her talents (she has not genius) is unchanged, for to us she is not the Hemans of America. We have no Hemans. The spirit breathed melodies of that daughter of song came in all their heavenly richness across the ocean, but her harp was never borne from her hand. Her 'mantle' wrapt the spirit in its ascension—for there was none worthy to receive it.

In Mrs. S.'s poem on Visiting the Institution for the Blind in Edinburg, there are some fine verses, as well as some bad philosophy. The closing verses of this poem are musical and original;—

'O peaceful Blind! the wheels of life,
That with their dust clouds dim the soul,
Ye see not their revolving strife,
But catch their music as they roll;
Ye see not how the scythe of time
Cuts the young blossom ere its springs,
Yet ye may trace with skill sublime,
The heavenward movement of his wings.'

'Corra Linn,' and 'Stratford-upon-Avon,' are fine descriptive poems, and others might be enumerated of, perhaps, equal excellence. The volume is published in a very handsome style, but the price at its first issue—$1.50—was outrageous. It can now be obtained, we suppose, for one dollar, perhaps less.

The Home; or Family Cares and Family Joys. By Frederica Bremer. Translated by Mary Howitt.

We remember that once we lost an appetite for a good dinner when we found the landlord would only charge ninepence for it, and it is somewhat so with us in reference to this book. Here are 64 large octavo—'New World'—pages, handsome small type, good paper and imprint, and yet all we were charged was 12 1-2 cts. It seems to us somebody must suffer, but yet it may be that the extensiveness of the circulation and the cash principle, make up for the lowness of the price. Be that as it may, we have not lost our appetite, but have read with real delight and enchanting interest. That it is possible to please every body sometimes, has been abundantly proved by the universal praise bestowed upon the 'Neighbors'—a picture of new married life—the first of the series of volumes on Life in Sweden. The present issue—'The Home'—will sustain the interest excited by that work. We know not how much we are indebted to the translator for the peculiarities of its natural, flowing style, but this much we do know—it reads just like Mary Howitt's own works. It speaks to 'the universal heart'—for it is nature. You read, as you look on some picture, with the conviction that it is no fancy sketch, but the true copy of real life. We rejoice that to such works as this such an immense circulation is given, for they bear on the waters of life and convey the vitality of moral goodness to millions of hearts. 'The Home' is a 'picture of family life during the growth of the children.' It is 'a sketch of home discipline, in which is seen, how without great worldly fortune, or extraordinary events, a deep interest may gather about a group of individuals; and how faults and failings, and diversity of dispositions, which without the great saving principles, would lead to sorrow and disunion, are by these saving principles, love and good sense, made to work themselves out, and leave behind them a scene of harmony, affection, and moral culture, most charming to contemplate.'

Family Worship, containing Reflections and Prayers for Domestic Devotion. By Otis A. Skinner. Boston: A. Tompkins and B. B. Mussey. 1843. 12mo. 216 pages.

This is the work of which we have spoken several times, as being in preparation. Its plan is good, and will, we think, be universally approved. It breathes a good spirit and has an elevated tone. The Reflections are brief, and the chapters of the Scriptures to which they are particularly applicable, are denoted. The Prayers also are brief, and as far as written prayers can, are the expression of the heart's desires and the soul's aspirations after the blessings of the divine life. The work is divided into several parts, so that the various services may easily be referred to as occasion may require. A large number of ministers have furnished prayers for the work, but we regret that their names are published. One excellence of the prayers is—each is adapted to impress on the mind some important idea.

We are obliged to write this notice in great haste, but we cannot but express our hope that this work will be extensively circulated and become greatly useful. It is admirably adapted to the purposes for which it was intended. The publishers have done their part well. The volume is very neat indeed, beautifully bound, and every way a fine work.

Past and Present. By Thomas Carlyle. 1 vol. 12 mo. Pp. 296.

This is the work which sometime since was advertised as about to be issued from the English press. It has been published in this country from the author's manuscript, for his benefit. Ralph Waldo Emerson is the American editor. This work will meet with similar treatment as the previous volumes by the eccentric author; some will read awhile and throw it down, others will read and re-read and lay it down only to think—to contemplate solemnly the vivid pictures he presents of social and tremendous evils. It will sound depths which few other works can reach, and teach, as few have the power to teach, how gigantic is Thought. To us, even in those passages which are so ludicrous as they first strike the mind, there is a melancholy which touches the deepest feelings, as we are led in beyond the fantastic drapery of madness and ruin. Well does the author say, after he has pictured the great Puff or Quack, whose life is Falsehood, and whose success is Pretension,—'Laugh not at him, O reader; or do not laugh only. He has ceased to become comic; he is fast becoming tragic.' We do believe this work will have some influence in behalf of the crushed humanity of England.

Sonnets and other Poems. By W. L. Garrison. Boston: Oliver Johnson. 12mo. Pp. 96.

We did not imagine that Mr. Garrison possessed the poetic talent which this very neat volume reveals. His is the poetry of impassioned thought, like Whittier's. It is poured out like the gifts of a mighty river—full, strong and rapid. It bears the mind irresistibly along with the train of thought, and the heart can no more be kept from beating strong than the pulse of the universe. His poem to his 'First-Born' is thrilling, and that he can be playful, is tested by his offering for 'May Day.' The piece entitled, 'Christian Rest,' is an ingenious poem—smooth versification and rapid flow of suggestive sentiment; a portion of it we intend to copy. His sonnets to Freedom and Liberty, are worthy of the subjects—majestic in thought and noble in expression. No volume of poems has been sent forth from the American press in a more beautiful style of typography than this.

Sacred Songs: for the Children in Sabbath Schools. By L. S. Everett. Boston: A. Tompkins. 1843. Pp. 54. 18mo.

This little work contains fifty hymns with appropriate music. The collection is made of those hymns which are generally familiar; and in reference to their suitability for children, the compiler remarks, 'Should any suppose that the Hymns are better adapted to the expression of sentiments entertained by adults, than to the thoughts, emotions, and aspirations of the young, it is deemed sufficient to reply, that the lessons learned in childhood should be of a kind, to be safely, and profitably repeated, during life.' The lessons to be learned from ideas, and the expression of those ideas in language, are confounded in this remark—it seems to us; however, we regard the collection as a very excellent one, and commend it to public attention. The tunes are our favorites, and such as seem to give the most pleasure when sung.

ERRATA. In our notice of Mr. Peabody's sermon on the 'Will and the Affections,' instead of 'the Scriptures of the Primitive Church,' read the Scriptures or the Primitive Church. In the Poem, 'The Sea of Galilee,' for 'stormy minds,' read stormy winds.
